I desire to put into the RECORD the absolute proof, which shows that the Department, instead of missing it from 5 to 10 per cent during the last six years, has come within an average of seven-tenths of 1 per cent in its estimates.

The Census Bureau is charged with the duty of publishing the exact amount produced after the crop has been entirely ginned. It is also charged with the duty of publishing every two weeks the exact amount ginned up to that time, and its final report at the end of the season includes every pound of cotton ginned in the United States, the substantial accuracy of which no man has ever successfully disputed.

Now, then, the Census Bureau's report shows that for the year 1899 the Department of Agriculture on the the 1st of December of that year had made an underestimate of the crop of 3.1 per cent; in 1900, that the Department of Agriculture had made an overestimate of two-tenths of 1 per cent; that in 1901 the Department had made an underestimate of five-tenths of 1 per cent; that in 1902 the Department had made an overestimate of four-tenths of 1 per cent; that in 1903 the Department had made an overestimate of 3.9 per cent; that in 1904 the Department had made an underestimate of 4.2 per cent. Averaging up these amounts, we find that during the period of six years, including last year, the actual difference between the Department's estimate made on the 1st of December and the final result as shown by the Census Bureau is that the Department is within seven-tenths of 1 per cent of being correct. It has missed the truth, averaging the six years, to the extent of only 74,680 bales per annum.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. What is the annual number of bales?

Mr. BOWIE. The average number of bales is about ten and one-half millions for the past six years. Now, I insist that for all practical purposes the departmental forecast, taking the period of six years as a basis, coming within seven-tenths of 1 per cent of the total—in other words, reducing it to bales, if they come within 75,000 bales a year of the true amount of cotton—has vindicated not only the honesty of those reports, but the substantial accuracy thereof.

The popular impression that these estimates have been further from the result than I have just stated is due to the fact that the Department of Agriculture has heretofore based its estimates upon a bale of one size while the Census Bureau's final report has used a bale of a different size, making a true comparison impossible so long as this difference existed. Since bales of cotton are of different sizes in different States and different seasons, an accurate comparison can never be made so long as the running bale is made the unit. The only true unit is the pound, which never fluctuates in either State or season.

Reducing, therefore, the Department estimate and the final census report for each of the past six years to the only true unit—the pound—we find the following remarkable result:

Number of pounds of lint cotton, as estimated by the Department of Agriculture and as subsequently reported by the Census Bureau, for the years 1899 to 1904, inclusive.

[d] Overestimate by Bureau of Statistics, 0.4 per cent.
[e] Overestimate by Bureau of Statistics, 3.9 per cent.
[f] Underestimate by Bureau of Statistics, 4.2 per cent.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it will be noticed from this table which I have read that for the years 1900, 1902, and 1903 the Department slightly overestimated the crop, and for the years 1899, 1901, and 1904 they slightly underestimated the crop.

The largest underestimate of the crop was 4.2 per cent in 1904; the largest overestimate of the crop was in 1903, of 3.9 per cent.

I assert that for the purposes of business, for all practical commercial purposes, the estimate which comes within 3 or 4 per cent, on the 1st of December, is sufficient to enable the business of this country to be conducted safely, and to arrive at something like a fair valuation of the crop before it leaves the producer's hands.

Now, I know, Mr. Chairman, that there are some men in the South, and also in the North, who think we ought to abolish these estimates altogether. And I believe the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING] has contended that they ought to be made in January instead of in December. As far as the latter suggestion is concerned, I would state that I would prefer to abolish them rather than to have them made in January, because they would then be too late for any practical purpose.

The question that is submitted to us is, Shall we abolish these estimates? I insist that we shall not, for this reason: If the Department of Agriculture does not do this work it will and must be done in some other way. It is a business necessity in this country that we should have information while the crop is being marketed as to its probable amount, in order that the business interests of this country can fix a fair price. You can not get along without information upon that subject at the time the crop is being marketed.

Mr. WANGER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BOWIE. I will.

Mr. WANGER. I understood my friend to refer to the business men of the country fixing the price of cotton. I would like to know whether or not the business men of the country, in his opinion, have as much to do with the fixing of the price of cotton as do the speculators in that article; whether it is not a fact that through speculation—in other words, through gambling—great fluctuations occur in the price of cotton which are injurious alike to the growers, the manufacturers, and that far greater portion of our fellow-citizens, the consumers of cotton products?

Mr. BOWIE. I have not the slightest doubt in the world, Mr. Chairman, that the speculation which goes on in the cotton exchanges of this country and in the bucket shops of this country have had and do have their effect upon the price of cotton. But ultimately the law of supply and demand will have its effect upon that question.

Now, if we could abolish by law speculation, or gambling, as the gentleman has called it, I have no doubt it would be a good thing, and I will be glad to see it done; but I am not expecting anything of that sort at this time. I realize that that is a condition and not a theory; but it is absolutely true, Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding all the speculation that can be indulged in, that at last the thing that fixes the prices of cotton is the supply and demand.

And the point of view of the producer is that he wants the information as to what the supply is and what the demand is before the cotton has gone out of his hands and into the hands of the speculator. If he can get the information before he has parted with the crop he is in a position to demand the value thereof. And if he does not get the information until after he has parted with it, he can not get the value of it.

Now, so far as the census report is concerned, I heartily favor the continuance of it. But the Census Bureau deals with only one phase of the question. Their current semimonthly reports are of inestimable value, as is also the final report, but they do not undertake an estimate of what the crop will be. They tell us what has passed. When they make their final official report all the cotton will have been sold and will have been out of the hands of the producer. The Department of Agriculture, by its system, on the other hand, of reporting the condition of the crop at various times during the year, and, finally, on the 1st of December, by reporting its estimate of the entire crop, gives information to the producer and consumer alike, which is of great benefit in the fixing of the price before the crop has entirely left the producer's hands.

Now, then, I say that cotton reporting and estimating is going to be done. If we abolish the system of making these estimates by the Department of Agriculture by act of Congress they will be made nevertheless. But who will make them? Mr. Theodore Price will make them in the interest of Mr. Theodore Price, Mr. Henry M. Neill will make them in the interest of the British spinner, and others will make them in the interest of the cotton producer. These are all right so far as they go from their standpoint and for their purposes, but we must all admit that if we depend exclusively upon them we will have these reports from biased and interested parties on one side or the other. The only place at which you can expect an absolutely impartial opinion upon the subject, based on a canvass of unquestioned value, is from the Government itself, which holds the scales equally between the producer and the consumer. Now, I do not wish to be understood as objecting to all private reports. The legitimate consumer of cotton has the right to inform himself through every possible avenue as to the true condition of affairs before he makes his purchases, and the legitimate producer has the right to the same information before he makes his sales. And when this information is sought and obtained by either party for proper business purposes, it is not only valuable in itself, but it may often operate as a wholesome check upon the Department. No matter how honest the majority of public officials may be, it can do them no harm to feel that the public eye is upon them.

But the difficulty is that the very moment you abolish the Government system the old band of hired brigands who have been practically put out of business of late will resume their nefarious occupations at the old stand, and armed with unlimited capital and resources will so distort and manipulate the facts that producer and consumer alike will be at their mercy.

Now, I undertake to say——

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BOWIE. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to have you state in this connection about how this information is gathered by the Government upon which they base their report.

Mr. BOWIE. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion. I undertake to say that the crop-reporting system of the Department of Agriculture is the best reporting system at least in America, if not in the world.

To begin with, they have traveling agents in the employ of the Government who visit every section of the South from the time the cotton is put into the ground until it is finally picked and ginned. Then they have State agents, who have their correspondents in every county of the State, from whom they get information as to the acreage first, as to the condition of the crop next, and their opinion on the 1st of December of the amount to be made. Then they have county correspondents, one man in every county. Then they have township correspondents, one man in every township. Then they have bankers and merchants, and, finally, they have correspondents in the case of individual planters who have been recommended to them.

They have 80,000 correspondents upon their list, from every one of whom they get, first, a report as to the acreage; second, a report as to the condition from time to time until November, and, finally, an estimate on the 1st of December of the entire crop. They get it from every one of these sources. Then they put it in the hands of a statistical board composed of two gentlemen from the North and two gentlemen from the South, presided over by the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, who consolidate the reports from these different sources and make the final estimate.

The widest fluctuation that the experience of six years has ever shown was last year, and it amounted to only 4.2 per cent, and there was ample reason for that, because it was an entirely abnormal season and the crop continued to fruit and produce for weeks longer than had ever been known in its history.

And, Mr. Chairman, I assert that the facts above shown are in themselves the highest possible vindication of the integrity, the fairness, and the impartiality of those eighty thousand correspondents, practically all of whom are Southern, to the manor born, who as a labor of love, without money and without price, have given to the Department and thus to the world the truth that makes us free from the false reports of speculators and manipulators.

Now, it has been popularly supposed that there was an error last year of 9.5 per cent. That supposition is based upon this mistake: The Department last year in estimating the number of bales based it upon what they thought would be the average size of the bale, about 507 pounds net weight. The Census Bureau, by which it has been subsequently checked, made their estimate upon a basis of 500 pounds gross weight. Consequently when you spread this difference over 13,000,000 or 14,000,000 bales you have a great number of bales. That mistake was not discovered and corrected until recently, and I will put into my remarks at this time a statement which was made a few days ago by the Secretary of Agriculture, in which he corrects the discrepancy between the size of the bales. He reduces it to a question of pounds, and shows the true difference last year was only 4.2 per cent. The same error was made for the preceding five years.

Now, shall we leave the business of making these estimates, which affects over $2,000,000,000 worth of property annually, because the value of the cotton in the raw state is at least $600,000,000 and fourteen or fifteen hundred millions more in the manufactured state——

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. If the gentleman will permit me, I frequently have letters on the subject, as I suppose every Member from the South has, and I received a letter to-day protesting against the change in the estimate of the Secretary of Agriculture from the 500 pounds net to the 500 pounds gross. Is that the 507 pounds that the gentleman just spoke of?

Mr. BOWIE. There was never a 500-pound net bale. The estimate made by the Department last year was on the basis of 507 pounds net. I think it was exactly 506 pounds and a fraction, but close to 507 pounds. The Department changed this year for a very good reason. This is fully explained in the paper which I will insert as a part of my remarks or have read, if any gentleman desires it. The record will show, for instance, in the year 1904, that in North Carolina the average bale weighed 469 pounds; in Florida it weighed 451 pounds; in Arkansas, 516; in Mississippi, 521 pounds, and so on down the line, varying in all the States. And this variation also applies to all the seasons. In other words, there is no such thing as uniformity in the ordinary commercial bale of cotton.

I now send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read the statement of the Secretary of Agriculture, which fully explains the whole matter.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE NECESSITY FOR UNIFORMITY OF EXPRESSION IN ESTIMATES AND REPORTS RELATING TO COTTON MADE BY DIFFERENT BUREAUS OF THE GOVERNMENT.

It will be recalled that in December of last year the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Agriculture made a preliminary estimate of the production of cotton for the season 1904–5 of 12,163,000 bales, and that subsequently the Bureau of the Census issued reports showing the total production to have been 13,438,000 bales, both amounts being exclusive of linters. This showed an apparent discrepancy of 9.5 per cent, the estimate of the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Agriculture being apparently that much too small, as shown by the actual facts disclosed by the census reports later on.

This discrepancy, to the extent indicated, did not actually exist. It was largely due to the fact that the Census Bureau expressed the production of the year in question in bales of 500 pounds gross weight, or 478 pounds net weight, as far as square bales were concerned, such bales constituting 98.3 per cent of the crop. For the purposes of this comparison the entire crop will be considered as having been in square bales, as the comparatively small amount in round bales and in bales of sea-island cotton would not appreciably affect the results intended to be shown. The estimate of the Bureau of Statistics was expressed as in "net" weight bales, which an examination of the figures used by the former Statistician of the Bureau, Mr. Hyde, shows to have been estimated at 506.2 pounds. If Mr. Hyde had employed the same basis as that employed by the Census Bureau in reducing his estimate of the pounds of lint cotton produced to bales—i. e., had he given the figures representing production in bales of a gross weight of 500 pounds each, or a net weight of 478 pounds each—his estimate would have shown 12,881,000 bales as having been produced, instead of 12,163,000, thus making the discrepancy between his preliminary estimate and the final figures of the Census Bureau only a trifle over 4 per cent.

Had Mr. Hyde made known in December of last year the basis upon which he predicated his estimate of 12,163,000 bales—that is, had he published the actual pounds of lint estimated as produced, exclusive of linters—the same placed in comparison with the actual number of net pounds produced, as shown by the Bureau of the Census, would have shown a divergence in his estimate of only 4.2 per cent, as may readily be seen by an examination of the following figures.

The final report of the Census Bureau indicated a total production for the season of 1904–5 of 6,426,698,000 pounds. The estimate of the Bureau of Statistics was 6,157,064,000 pounds, both figures being given in round numbers, exclusive of linters. The difference between the estimate of the Bureau of Statistics and the report of the Bureau of the Census was 269,634,000 pounds, a discrepancy of a trifle over 4 per cent.

It must be plain to anyone from the foregoing that had the Census Bureau and the Bureau of Statistics used the same basis in reporting and estimating the number of bales produced the estimate of the Bureau of Statistics would not have been considered as seriously out of the way.

The figures given above emphasize the necessity of uniformity in methods of statistical expression as between different bureaus of the Government; and it was for this reason that the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Agriculture decided, in making the estimate on December 4 of the probable yield of cotton this season, to express the same in bales of the same size as the bales reported by the Census Bureau, thus establishing uniformity and enabling a ready comparison of the figures emanating from the two bureaus.

There has been some criticism of the Bureau of Statistics because of its departure this year from its previous custom of reporting the number of net-weight bales and in using the gross-weight bale instead; but it is thought the above statement will be sufficient to make it plain to anyone that the step was taken properly and that any other method would be likely to lead to the same confusion and misunderstanding that has existed regarding reports made in previous years.

Mr. BOWIE. In further explanation of this point I insert an item recently clipped from the columns of the New York Commercial, as follows:

The weighers' reports of the cotton received here this season show that it takes at least 110 bales to show 50,000 pounds.

This means an average gross weight of the season for cotton received in New York, counting bagging and ties, of 454½ pounds per bale. If we applied the Department basis of last year, this 50,000 pounds of cotton would only have produced 94½ bales, a difference of 16 per cent in the relative weight of the bales.

A bale of cotton as it comes pressed from the gin varies in every State, in every county, and in every season. Therefore, when we make our comparisons with the past, with bales of cotton which varied in every State and in every county and with every season, we have a comparison that is not only valueless, but positively misleading. Consequently, when the Department of Agriculture was called upon to defend its reports, as it was when checked by the Census Bureau, it had to meet the proposition that the Census Bureau had put the bale of cotton at a fixed amount of 500 pounds gross weight and the Department of Agriculture had put it at a fixed amount of 507 pounds net.

Mr. LOVERING. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BOWIE. Certainly.

Mr. LOVERING. How does the gentleman explain the discrepancy between the ginners' report, issued two hours and a half ago, and the estimate of the Bureau as of the 1st day of December? There was a difference in the report of the Census Bureau a fortnight ago of 22,000 bales more reported to have been already ginned than the Bureau estimated would be ginned during the entire season.

Mr. BOWIE. In certain States.

Mr. LOVERING. That 22,000 bales has grown by the report to-day to more than 183,000 bales in excess of what the Bureau estimates will be ginned during the entire season.

Mr. BOWIE. I thank the gentleman for his question. There are two answers to it. In the first place, he has selected only four States out of fourteen, and it is well known that, it being an estimate entirely, you can not expect that it shall be absolutely correct in every State. It is sufficient for the purposes of the business of the world that the aggregate of all the States shall approximate the truth and shall be honestly reported.

Mr. LOVERING. Why can not you expect it to be correct?

Mr. BOWIE. The gentleman has singled out certain States. The gentleman omits to state that in each of the States he has singled out a bale of cotton as it comes from the gin is less than 500 pounds, whereas the Department has made its estimate on a 500-pound bale basis.

Mr. LOVERING. I will say that the State of Georgia, where there is the largest discrepancy, has bales averaging fully 500 pounds.

Mr. BOWIE. Not at all. Upon the contrary, the average last year, which was the largest in the history of the cotton crop, was only 480 pounds in the State of Georgia. In the State of North Carolina, where the next largest discrepancy takes place, the average last year, when the bales were the heaviest that they had ever been in the history of that State, was only 469 pounds.

Mr. LOVERING. Allowing every latitude possible, there is no explanation of the 183,000 bales discrepancy.

Mr. BOWIE. If the gentleman will reduce his census bales to the size that they actually are, there has not been as much ginned in those States as the Department of Agriculture estimated there would be. There was a statement made only on yesterday, in the hearing of the gentleman, that one man had 300 bales of cotton in one warehouse in North Carolina the average weight of which was only 428 pounds, and the average for the State is only 450 pounds or less.

Mr. BURLESON. I will state in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, if the gentleman will permit me, that if you will reduce the running bales of the Agricultural Department to the 500-pound gross weight bales of the Census Bureau there will be absolutely no discrepancy between the Agricultural Department estimates and the last report that has just been issued by the Census Bureau; on the contrary, that this last report issued by the Census Bureau is a verification of the estimate made by the Agricultural Department instead of a refutation or contradiction of it.

Mr. BOWIE. Yes; the gentleman from Texas is absolutely correct. I hold in my hand the report to which the gentleman refers, made two hours ago by the Census Bureau. That report shows that the percentage of the total crop ginned up to December 13, 1904, was 89 per cent. It is admitted by every person who has informed himself on the subject that the high price of cotton prevailing this year and the early season has brought the cotton to the market earlier than it has ever come in the history of the crop. But take the basis of 89 per cent, the same basis they had last year, and the crop as shown by the census report will come within 100,000 bales of the Department estimate.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman will pardon me, is it not always the case that in the era of high prices the bales are light in weight?

Mr. BOWIE. The bales are lighter on account of high prices and on account of the fact that seed cotton varies in lint production from year to year; that is the universal experience. This year the seed cotton produces less lint than it did last year.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I started to say a while ago, we are up against this proposition: Shall we depend for our information in regard to this great product upon the work of private agencies, one side of which is gotten up for the purpose of reducing the price and the other side of which is gotten up for the purpose of increasing the price, or shall we take an impartial source that will hold the scales equal and just between the producer and the consumer?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. BOWIE. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, in that connection, and merely for the purpose of emphasizing what the gentleman from Alabama has so well said, I wish to say that at a number of farmers' meetings this year in North Carolina in my own district I have asked that question, whether the farmers would prefer to take the Government report rather than rely upon the report of the speculators, and uniformly in these farmers' meetings I was told that the farmers desired a continuance of these reports.

Mr. BOWIE. That is my information with this exception, that you will find many men buying cotton in the South who are just as much bears as if they were buying in New England, and when men in the South try to buy cotton they are just as eager to buy it cheap as they are in New England.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Of course our people in North Carolina and the South want accurate reports.

Mr. BOWIE. Oh, yes; absolutely.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. That goes without saying, but at the same time I understand from them that they prefer to continue the Government reports rather than to take the reports of the speculators.

Mr. BOWIE. I have not a doubt of it. I have no doubt if you put it to a vote to-morrow that these people who have to go up against the reports from private speculators, although they lost 2 or 2½ cents a pound by a break of prices produced by the December, 1904, estimate of cotton, that nine-tenths would vote in favor of a continuance of these reports, because they believe that events have fully justified and vindicated their accuracy and fairness in the past.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am aware of the fact that there have been complaints justly made of certain officials of the statistical department of the Government. I shall not undertake, in the course of these remarks, to speak on a subject that is pending in the criminal courts. I am heartily in favor of anything that will send the men who have acted fraudulently in that Bureau to the penitentiary. There has been evidence—at least in one case, and perhaps in others—that there has been fraud shown, especially with respect to the acreage reports made in the spring of the year. There may have been other cases just as criminal which have been undiscovered. I hope justice will be meted out to those who are guilty, and I hope the law will prove sufficient, and if it does not prove sufficient, I am in favor of making it so, so as to cover all future cases. And I wish here to state that the Southern Cotton Association, through its officials, performed a notable public service in the part they took in their discovery and exposure. But, notwithstanding the fact that fraud was proven in that case, I assert that the past estimates of the Bureau are fully and amply sustained by evidence that is not open to contradiction.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the head of the great Department of Agriculture is a man as pure, upright, and as honest as this country contains within its length and breadth. [Applause.] As far as I am concerned, I believe that no man in America would be quicker to frown upon fraud practiced within his Department than would he. If fraud has entered into it in the past, or should enter into it in the future, I haven't the slightest doubt that upon getting evidence of that fact he would act, and act promptly, upon it. I do not expect that we should have absolute honesty in that Department any more than in any other. All I say is that we have in the Department of Agriculture facilities for getting a crop report and condition reports that do not exist anywhere else in this country, that we have in that Department the disposition to report it impartially and fairly, and to hold the scales equally between all concerned, and I believe, Mr. Chairman, that it would be a great injury to the producer of cotton and a great injury to the consumer of cotton if we take out of the hands of an impartial and disinterested board the doing of work of this character and put it into the hands of private agencies, no matter what those private agencies are or who they may be.

Mr. Chairman, before closing my remarks it would no doubt be proper for me to say, for it has already been given to the press and published broadcast in the country, that this resolution was unanimously laid upon the table after a full hearing on both sides before the House Committee on Agriculture, which had before it the Lovering resolution, which I had read at the opening of my remarks, at which Mr. LOVERING spoke in its behalf, and at which the opposition to its adoption was ably represented by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON], the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON], and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS], speaking alike for the producer and the consumer.

I have spoken upon the subject merely because I thought it was due to the country, and particularly to my section of the country, that the facts which have been so much perverted and obscured in the past by misleading statements and comparisons should be known and given the fullest possible circulation.

I believe that the final report of the Census Bureau for this year will fully vindicate the substantial accuracy and the absolute integrity of the Department's estimate made on December 1.

I know that the experience of the past six years has fully warranted and vindicated the public confidence, unmistakably shown by the course of the market upon these reports. I do not believe there is or ever was any necessary for the adoption of such a resolution as this, and I am glad to know that in that belief I am supported by the unanimous opinion of the House Committee on Agriculture, which has given this question most careful study and consideration.

It has only been within the last few years that the price of cotton has reached a point which would give a fair profit to its producers.

For each of the years 1903, 1904, and 1905 its value has exceeded $600,000,000.

Though the crop of this year is shorter than the crop of last year by more than 3,000,000 bales, it is likely that by one of the contradictions of trade its value will be greater by many millions of dollars.

I should not be surprised to see—if not this year, certainly within the near future—the total value of the cotton crop in the producers' hands exceed $700,000,000. It was only seven or eight years ago that the value was less than $300,000,000. I here insert a tabular statement showing the annual increase in value since 1898.

	Bales.	Values.
1899–1900	9,436,416	363,784,820
1900–1901	10,383,422	494,567,54-
1901–2	10,680,680	438,014,687
1902–3	10,727,559	480,770,282
1903–4	10,011,374	617,501,548
1904–5	13,565,885	628,195,359

What this difference means to the people of the South can not be told in speech nor described in words.

What is it that has enabled the people of the South within the past five or six years to attain a degree of prosperity never enjoyed since 1860?

I assert, first, that the Department of Agriculture has done its full share in that splendid work. Aye, sir, I assert that the Bureau of Statistics of that Department has performed a great service in that regard.

This is not the time nor the place for me to review the great work that the Department of Agriculture has done and is doing, not only for the people of the United States in general, but for the people of my section in particular; but this I do assert, that no single agency of the Government has contributed so much to our prosperity and happiness.

But, Mr. Chairman, as much as the Department of Agriculture has undoubtedly been able to do, and frank as I am to give due credit for all that it has done, I assert that the present prosperity of the people of the South and the great victory which they have won from those who in the past have been able successfully to crush down the value of their greatest staple and to pauperize the men in its production is due in the largest measure to the work of their own hands, to the spirit of unity of purpose which has actuated them under trying conditions.

There were those who thought that the December, 1904, estimate of the Department of Agriculture was a great curse to our people. It unquestionably did have a depressing temporary effect upon the price of cotton, but I assert that it caused the greatest blessing ever conferred upon our people! It brought them face to face with a great danger, and when they saw the danger in its full extent they acted!

In the convention held in New Orleans in January, 1905, there were thousands of delegates from every State in the South, composed of bankers, lawyers, merchants, and farmers, banded together as one unit to hold, to preserve, protect, and to save from destruction the great staple upon which our people so much depend!

That convention recommended, first, that the unsold cotton should be kept off the market until the price went to 10 cents a pound, and, second, that the acreage for the ensuing year be reduced 25 per cent.

The recommendations were laughed at by Mr. Theodore Price and others, who still insisted that cotton would go to 5 cents per pound, but in thirty days Mr. Price was on the verge of bankruptcy, and he has admitted that he would have failed if he had not seen the handwriting on the wall and reversed his position. In less than two months' time cotton had increased in value at least $10 per bale. In five months' time it was selling at between 10 and 11 cents per pound, or an increase of from $20 to $25 a bale. It has sold recently in the South at 12 cents per pound on the wagon.

The men who had faith in the movement, who stood by it, saw it vindicated! I do not believe they have so soon forgotten the lesson which they learned last year.

All that they need to protect the price on the staple in the future is to act as they did a year ago—to stand together, each for all and all for each—determined that there shall be fair play dealt out to the men who actually grow the cotton, instead of giving all of its profits to the band of speculators "who toil not, neither do they spin," but whose actions and whose iniquities make them fit companions in infamy with the other kings of frenzied finance and the insurance magnates now sojourning in foreign lands, "who have left their country for their country's good."

It has been charged that the Southern Cotton Association, which, acting through Mr. Harvie Jordan, its president, has recommended that the balance of the crop now remaining in the producers' hands be taken from the market and held until the price equals 15 cents a pound, is unwise and likely to do permanent injury to the cotton planters of the South as well as to the consumers of cotton. I assert that this is a mistaken view. In the first place, it matters little whether Mr. Harvie Jordan or Mr. Anybody-else should advise the farmers not to sell until the price reaches 15 cents per pound. They may take the advice or they may not take it. It may have been wise or it may not have been wise for Mr. Jordan to give it, but the fact is, Mr. Chairman, that all the powers of speculation combined can not prevent cotton from greatly increasing in value before the summer is over, and Mr. Jordan is simply giving the planters of the South the advice to sell their cotton for the highest price which they can get for it ,and with this position we all do, and ought, to sympathize.

To all appearances the crop for the year 1905 will be three and one-half million bales less than the crop of 1904. Not a single disinterested estimate places the reduction at less than 3,000,000 bales. The takings by spinners this year exceed the takings last year, notwithstanding the enormous difference in price, by more than a quarter of a million bales. Assuming the reduction of the crop to be only 3,000,000 bales, the spinners of the world are face to face with the fact that for the remainder of the year they will have at least three and one-quarter, if not three and one-half, million bales less to go on than they had a year ago, with this difference, of course there was about a million bales more brought forward into the year 1905 than in the year 1904. Allowing for that difference, there is still an absolute shortage of over 2,000,000 bales as compared with the conditions of last year. Against this shortage, on the other hand, we have 5,000,000 new spindles erected during the year and an increasing market throughout the world, a more general diffusion of prosperity, and therefore of purchasing power, than ever known before, and peace in the Orient. Under conditions far less favorable the price of cotton went to 17 cents per pound two years ago, and to my mind 15 cents per pound this year is not an unreasonable expectation.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is asserted that this price is too high for cotton and that the spinners can not make a profit on it at that figure. The answer to this is very simple; a difference of 2 or 3 cents in a pound of cotton can not be found in a shirt or a handkerchief or other articles of personal apparel. All that the manufacturer has to do is to correspondingly raise the price of his goods, and this he undoubtedly will do, as he has invariably done in the past. It will never be felt by the consumer when it reaches him.

The price of wool is 30 cents a pound, and upon any fair comparison of actual values there is no such difference intrinsically as the market has shown between these two products.

I believe we have reached the point at which the world demands and is willing to pay and can afford to pay a higher price for cotton than it has in the past.

Of course by planting for an excessive crop during the coming year and forgetting the lesson so recently learned it is within the power of the producers of cotton "to kill the goose that lays the golden egg" and reduce the price of their own product by their own action to a starvation point again. But I don't believe, Mr. Chairman, that they will do it. The propaganda has already been started which, I believe, will be successful in holding the acreage down to the same point that it was last year.

The likelihood is, through better farming methods and through the probability of a better crop yield, for it could scarcely be worse, the cotton actually raised, without any increase of acreage, will be a million more bales next year than this one. I should not regard this as a calamity. Upon the contrary, I believe the world now needs and is willing to pay for twelve and one-half million bales of cotton annually. It will not be many years before it will need and will be willing to pay a fair price for 15,000,000 bales of cotton.

The people of the South will be able to produce all the cotton needed for the world's consumption, not through the mistaken medium of an increase of acreage, but through the far wiser and more economical plan of better agricultural methods, which will produce a greater yield of lint per acre.

In this direction lies the future hope of prosperity in the South, as well as the keeping of the supply of cotton approximately equal to the demand—but for my part I want the demand to always keep just a little in excess of the supply!

Just as the farmers of the West have doubled the yield of corn per acre by better and more scientific methods, so do I believe the farmers of the South will increase the yield of their cotton per acre, and thereby decrease its cost by the study and application of more improved methods of culture, by a wiser system of seed selection, and a more general diversification of crops, and at the same time demand and receive a fair reward for their labor. [Applause.]

Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Chairman, I am unwilling that the speech of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BOWIE] should go unchallenged or that the statements he furnished in his attack upon my resolution should go out unaccompanied by statements from me in refutation thereof, as I said before the Committee on Agriculture that in introducing this resolution to revise the estimates I disclaim absolutely any purpose to question the integrity of the Secretary of Agriculture or of anyone in his Department. No, nor to question their ability nor impugn their motives.

I do not believe there is a more honest or efficient officer in the service of the Government than the present Secretary, and were he to resign I do not know where the Government would find as good a man to fill the place. Having said this, I am entirely justified in questioning the methods employed in making the recent cotton-crop estimate of December 4 and the propriety, from every business standpoint, of making it at that date. Furthermore, I am justified in asking whether the agents employed in the cotton States are entirely free from the influences surrounding them, which are well known to be in the interest of underestimating the crop. As a cotton spinner and in the interest of cotton spinners, I am anxious that all of the figures and estimates given out to the public shall be as nearly exact as is possible and as free from guessing as may be.

And therefore, to begin with, I think the Bureau estimate should never be made earlier than January 1 of each year. It is nearer the end of the ginning season, and the data available at that time is more reliable and exact than on December 1.

Then, too, I think the Bureau report should be made with some reference to the ginning reports, which by January 1 will have been so frequent and so full as to be an indisputable indicator of the crop. Now I am told that such census reports are not taken into account in making the Bureau estimates.

As I understand it, the procedure of the Bureau is to ascertain, first, the number of acres under cultivation; second, the abandoned acreage; third, the net acreage; fourth, the number of pounds per acre of seed cotton in each State; fifth, the percentage of lint per hundred pounds of seed cotton; and, sixth, having arrived at the pounds of lint per acre, multiply this by the acres in each State and divide by 478, net lint to bales of 500 gross.

Now, this may all be very well, but of these six factors the last only is a known quantity. All the rest are guesses, or an average of guesses, possessing all the elements of uncertainty and subject to the whims and environments of the agents located in many thousand places—I am told 80,000.

But allowing them all to be conscientious and impartial men, I maintain that they could furnish more accurate reports on January 1 than on December 1. I do not believe they would deny this themselves, and if they are conscientious I believe they would modify in January the statements or returns they sent out in December.

It is for this reason that I have introduced and am pressing this resolution. A wrong has been done and it should be righted.

The Bureau should have the right, in the light of the census reports, to revise its final estimate of the season, and that, too, before the final ginners' report and the final commercial estimate shall be determined.

Now, perhaps some one will ask my reasons for doubting the last estimate of the Department of Agriculture. Although it is a matter of common knowledge, I desire to emphasize some of the reasons for taking this action.

I.

Inaccuracy of the report of the Department of Agriculture as demonstrated by the ginners' report of December 1.

State.	Government estimate, Dec. 4, 1905.	Ginners' report, Dec. 1, 1905.
Georgia	1,564,311	1,561,061
North Carolina	545,055	573,598
Oklahoma	231,838	230,648
South Carolina	995,027	992,708
Total	3,336,231	3,358,015

By the 1st of December these four States had ginned 22,000 bales in excess of the Bureau estimate. The ginners' report issued the 20th shows the excess to have grown to 183,341 bales.

II.

As explained by Secretary Wilson, the delay in issuing the Bureau estimate on December 4 this year was caused by wide divergence in the reports sent in as to the yield per acre.

In the opinion of all unbiased and conservative observers of the cotton situation, the condition figures published by the Government in September, October, and November were fairly accurate and represented the relative improvement experienced by the crop, thanks to the splendid fall. The October conditions figure for Texas was exactly the same as a year ago, and other States showed a slight reduction only. In the absence of detail-yield figures, the following calculation has been made on the actual yield for 1904 and the estimate yield for 1905. These figures are based on the entire acreage estimated by the Department of Agriculture, no allowance having been made for abandonment, as no detailed figures are available. In conjunction with these figures the October condition for the various States is given this year and last year.

Arkansas	77	72	199	166
Florida	82	76	125	140
Georgia	78	76	201	196
Indian Territory	83	78	240	189
Louisiana	78	59	268	165
Mississippi	77	68	224	185
Missouri	82	81	296	280
North Carolina	82	77	252	233
Oklahoma	85	80	316	260
South Carolina	82	74	214	215
Tennessee	76	79	174	218
Texas	69	69	173	156
Virginia	82	77	184	232
General average	75.8	71.2	222	186

In the light of the October condition figures, the yield figures are mostly quite incongruous and appear to have been fixed in an absolutely arbitrary spirit. Arkansas had a poor yield last year, owing to floods in the spring, and it is hardly conceivable that with a condition figure only 6½ per cent lower there should have been a decrease in yield of 16 per cent. Similar objection may be made to the yield figures for the other Gulf States, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Texas. In the case of Georgia, North Carolina, and Oklahoma the proportion between condition figures and yield is well maintained; but, strange to say, just in those States the Agricultural Bureau is already shown to have considerably underestimated. More glaring still is the case of South Carolina. The condition is about 10 per cent lower than last year, but the yield according to Government figures is higher. The probability is that the acreage figures underlying the calculation of the Government are absolutely wrong. Yield figures on a wrong acreage are worse than useless, and the Government ought to abandon the acreage figures and estimate the yield, with the assistance of the census figures, of cotton ginned to the latest available date.

III.

To December 13 this year a quantity of at least 9,200,000 bales will have been ginned. In the Gulf States and north Texas ginning is still proceeding on a heavy scale, and the daily quantity ginned between November 14 and December 13 will this year have been about 68,000 bales, as compared with 87,000 bales last year and 68,000 bales in 1903 for the same period. This would prove that there is no exhaustion, and, as in former years, the least quantity ginned after December 13 has been 1,300,000 in the small crop year 1903–4, hardly less can be expected this year. It is much more likely that a far greater quantity remains to be ginned than in 1903 or in 1902 by reason of the lateness of the crop in the most prolific States.

IV.

The tendency of the Department of Agriculture has generally been to underestimate the size of the crop, to the great detriment of the consumer. During the past five years the underestimate has averaged 632,400 bales, or 5.6 per cent; during the past ten years the underestimate reached 778,400, or 7.6 per cent. Below is a table giving the Government estimates and the commercial crops, as determined by the Financial Chronicle:

Season.	Government estimate.	Commercial crop.	Underestimate (per cent).
1895–6	6,375,000	7,147,000	10.8
1896–7	8,250,000	8,706,000	5.3
1897–8	9,600,000	11,216,000	14.4
1898–9	10,000,000	11,256,000	11.2
1899–1900	8,900,000	9,422,000	5.5
1900–1901	10,100,000	10,389,000	2.6
1901–2	9,674,000	10,701,000	9.6
1902–3	10,417,000	10,758,000	3.1
1904–5	12,163,000	13,557,000	10.1

While the commercial crop, as counted by the New Orleans and New York Cotton Exchanges and the Financial Chronicle, includes such linters as may have been produced and shipped out of each year's crop, it does not, on the other hand, include the cotton which is held in farmers' hands at the end of each season and which fully offsets the linter production.

In regard to the claim that the light weight of the bales in the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Oklahoma offsets the excess of cotton shown to have been already ginned in these States, as compared with the Department of Agriculture's estimate of the total crop, I quote the following telegram from New Orleans, published in the New York Journal of Commeree of December 6:

Secretary Hester makes the actual average weight of 4,252,543 bales of cotton crop, embracing port receipts and overland for three months, from September to November, inclusive, 519.10 against 523.23 pounds per bale last year, a decease of 4.13. Detailed averages are Texas, 534.56; Louisiana, 522.16; Alabama, etc., 530; Georgia, 508; South Carolina, 500; North Carolina, 501.95; Virginia, 496; Tennessee, etc., including Memphis, St. Louis, and overland, 523.82.

From the above it will be noticed that this official statement of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange indicates that in no State except Virginia is the average weight of the bales less than 500 pounds gross.

Converting yesterday's report of the United States Census of the quantity of cotton ginned up to the 13th of December on the basis of the average weight of this year's bales, as reported by the New Orleans Cotton Exchange, it is found that there had been ginned up to the 13th of December in the equivalent of bales of 500 pounds gross 9,647,000. As the estimate of the Agricultural Department is, by its own statement, in bales of an average weight of 500 pounds gross, or 478 pounds net, it is made more evident than previously that the estimate of the Department of Agriculture is an underestimate and has already been substantially exceeded by the amount of cotton ginned up to the 13th of December in the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Oklahoma, and has been closely aproximated by the amount of cotton ginned to the 13th of December in Texas and Alabama.

This makes it evident that the claim that the light weight of bales in the Carolinas, Georgia, and Oklahoma offsets the disparity between the ginning returns and the figures of the Agricultural Department is unwarranted.

The details of yesterday's ginners' report in bales of actual weight, 2 round bales being counted as 1 square bale, the equivalent of these returns in bales of 500 pounds gross, and the estimate of the Agricultural Department, by States, is as follows, thousands omitted:

State.	Total ginned to Dec. 13, running bales 2 round equal to 1 square.	Average weight as per New Orleans Cotton Exchange.	Total equivalent in 500-pound bales.	Total crop as estimated by Agricultural Department, bales of 500 pounds gross.

In the opinion of all close observers the underestimate this year is near the average of the last ten years, the growth being likely to reach 10,900,000 to 11,000,000 bales. This underestimate by the Government practically sanctions the exorbitant demands made by southern farmers and holders and causes very serious loss to the spinning and manufacturing industry of this country. It is a well-known fact that the South always underestimates the size of the cotton crop, and the Government ought, in the interest of the cotton-textile trade, to try to arrive at an impartial estimate. The former Statistician of the Department of Agriculture, Mr. John Hyde, is reported by the Manchester Guardian, Tuesday, December 5, 1905, to have said that—

There is not the slightest doubt that the correspondents of the Department have combined to mislead it, and that the actual crop will prove to be not far from 11,000,000 bales. The Department's correspondents always underestimate the crop, and this year the enormous influence of the Southern Cotton Association has been brought to bear upon them with the object of inducing them deliberately to misrepresent the actual condition.

Although now in an unofficial capacity, Mr. Hyde is no doubt in the best position to appreciate and weigh the reports of the southern correspondents at their exact value.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to be perfectly fair in this matter. It is obvious that if an underestimate of the crop is made, which is very serious, it is to the disadvantage of consumers of cotton. It is obvious that if an overestimate is made it is a disadvantage to the planter. Now, what has happened? These estimates have been made, and it has been shown that the average is over 758,000 bales underestimated during the last ten years, and it is but fair to assume that the proportion has not been much disturbed during this last year.

Now, what is the effect? Of course the effect of a "bullish" report on the cotton crop would be to put down the price of cotton, or if a "bearish" report on the cotton crop it would put up the price of cotton.

I do not claim to be any less human than anybody else. I am a cotton manufacturer, and represent cotton spinners, and I know that the profit to the cotton manufacturer nowadays is exceedingly small; and I say that 12 cents a pound for cotton seems to the spinner an unreasonable and fanciful price, and is as bad for him as 5 cents a pound is for the planter. Fifteen cents per pound is a famine price, and would have the same effect it did when it was 15 cents under what was known as the "Sully boom," when 25 per cent of all the spindles in the country were stopped.

Mr. BOWIE. But they took all the cotton they could get at 5 cents.

Mr. LOVERING. They are not fools. They will take all they can get at the lowest price and the farmers will get all they can. Do not forget that.

Now, here is the farmer making from 100 to 150 per cent upon an article, while the manufacturer is fortunate if he makes 4 or 5 per cent, and many times he makes much less. The wage scale in Fall River is influenced by the difference in the price of a print cloth and the price of cotton. As the price of cotton goes up the difference narrows. The wage-earner is paid there a percentage in surplus wages of the difference between the two.

The other day when the Bureau estimate came out cotton jumped four or five dollars a bale.

What was the effect? It wiped out the entire difference there was, so that the week before 6 per cent could have been added to the wages of the employees, but as it turned out there was nothing for them. That is the way it affects the operative.

For that reason I want to see such estimate as shall keep the thing on a fair level. Twelve and one-half cents is a prohibitive price for cotton. Fifteen cents is a famine price for cotton, and it would stop spinning.

Mr. BURLESON. And 5 cents is a ruinous price.

Mr. LOVERING. Yes; 5 cents is a ruinous price for everybody. Cotton is to a man's back what food is to his stomach. It is a prime necessity of life. It ought not to be kept at an abnormally high figure. It only can be kept there by manipulation and combination and collusion, which are as repugnant to the Sherman antitrust act as is the keeping of beef at an abnormally high figure. It is just the same.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I will address myself directly to the issue. I feel quite sure that my friend from Massachusetts has dealt with this matter with the utmost candor and sincerity. It is gratifying to us all that he bears witness to the integrity of our Secretary of Agriculture, and that he continues to testify to his confidence in the honesty and ability of the gentlemen who make up the statistical estimates of the cotton crop in the Department of Agriculture. I deplore, however, the fact that the gentleman from Massachusetts has so suddenly and completely lost confidence in the methods pursued by the Department in making its estimate of the cotton crop. If I remember aright, last year, when the Department's estimate indicated the largest cotton crop that was ever grown in the history of the product, when I was called upon to defend the integrity and virtue of its estimate, standing by my side at that time was the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING], proclaiming that he not only believed in the integrity, the value, and the virtue of that report, but also in the methods by which the estimate was reached. This year, when we have unquestionably a small crop, I sincerely regret that the gentleman from Massachusetts, human though he be, as he confesses, is now asserting his loss of all confidence in the methods pursued by the Agricultural Department for obtaining this statistical result.

As I have said, last year (1904–5) there was raised in the South the largest cotton crop in its history—a crop in size beyond the comprehension even of cotton experts. No one looked for such an enormous crop; no one thought such a crop possible. Even professional estimators representing foreign cotton interests, who are ever present with enormous overestimates, did not have the "nerve" to estimate near 13,000,000 bales. However, the reports during the growing season made by the Department of Agriculture from month to month had forecasted such a crop, and on December 3, 1904, it gave out an estimate for the year of over 12,000,000 bales. This report we all know was received by the producers with storms of protest, the charge being freely made that it was an overestimate. It was later demonstrated that the report of the crop was nearer the true facts than any other estimate, and was in fact slightly below the amount of cotton actually produced.

The gentleman from Massachusetts now earnestly contends that the present crop has been underestimated. I think I can conclusively show that the gentleman is laboring under a grievous misapprehension of the facts. The gentleman suggests that the estimates of the Bureau of Statistics should be made with some reference to the ginning reports issued by the Census Bureau, and states that he is told that such ginning reports are not taken into account in making the Bureau of Statistics estimates. It so happens that I am prepared to inform the gentleman positively that his information on this point is absolutely without foundation in truth. On December 4 last I was present when the estimate was made, and I regret that the gentleman from Massachusetts was not there; I know that the Secretary of Agriculture invited and urged him to be present. I was there from the beginning until the doors were opened and the final figures given to the public. I followed every step of the procedure in preparing the final estimate of the production of cotton this year, and I say to the gentleman that the census ginners' reports issued prior to December 4 were given due weight—in fact, were taken very seriously into account.

When the board of four statisticians assembled, all reports from the several distinct corps of correspondents—viz, special field agents, state statistical agents, county correspondents, township correspondents, special cotton correspondents, individual planters, and ginners—were brought together in convenient form on parallel columns and each member of the board was provided with the figures. The members of the board at this time also had before them the latest reports of the Weather Bureau and the census ginners' reports, and from these exhaustive data the statisticians prepared their estimates, which were used in an arithmetical and statistical computation of the report. Henceforth the gentleman may be at ease on this matter; but as a matter of fact the census reports made from time to time during the season, based on ginners' returns, while of very great interest and value, are not certain indications of the season's total production. The reasons for this are plain. In the first place, these preliminary census reports show the number of running bales that have been ginned to a given date, regardless of weight, and it is well known that these bale weights vary astonishingly in the different States and also vary in one year as compared with another; secondly, it is also well known that the seasons also vary—one may be much earlier or later than another—that is, the crop matures more rapidly and is gathered and ginned more quickly some years than in others. The exact ratio as between one year and another has not been and never can be known; but the fact that one season is earlier or later than another and that no two seasons are alike in this respect prevents the census reports made during the progress of the season from being an absolutely accurate indication of the probable total crop. The fact that the gentleman does not seem to understand this is one reason I have for stating that he is laboring under a misapprehension of the facts.

Now, upon what further facts does he base his contention that the last report of the Agricultural Department is inaccurate or is an underestimate of the cotton crop? He selects from the report three States and one Territory—the States of North Carolina and South Carolina and Georgia, and the Territory of Oklahoma—and because, perchance, the aggregate yield of cotton reported by the Agricultural Department as the crop for this year is less by about 22,000 bales than is shown to have been already ginned up to December 1 by the Census Bureau, he rushes to the conclusion that of course it is an underestimate of the crop throughout the cotton region; but, mark you, in reaching this conclusion he at the same time ignores the reports from nine other States and one Territory which also grow cotton. Now, in the very nature of things an estimate can not be exact; if it was it would be no longer an estimate. The real issue is not whether the estimate is exact in the particular State, but whether, taking it as a whole, it is an honest and fairly accurate estimate of the crop in the entire cotton section. He also ignores completely the fact that the Agricultural Department when it announced its estimate of the crop on December 4 announced the result of its statistical calculations in bales of 500 pounds gross weight, whereas the Census Bureau announces its results in all its preliminary reports in "running" bales just as they come from the ginneries, without reference to weight, in some States the bales weighing as little as 450 pounds and in others more.

Last year in the State of North Carolina the running bales were quite light, weighing only 469 pounds on an average. As I have said, when the Agricultural Department announced its estimate this year it expressed the result in bales of 500 pounds gross weight. Now, I submit that in order to institute an intelligent comparison—I will go further and say that in order to institute a just and fair comparison between this estimate of the crop announced by the Bureau of Statistics of the Agricultural Department and the report of the Census Bureau covering the quantity ginned up to December 1 one must reduce the figures giving the number of running bales ginned in any given State to bales of 500 pounds gross weight, this being the basis used by the Agricultural Department in announcing its estimate. I will state in this connection that this is also the basis used by the Bureau of the Census in its final report at the close of each season.

When you pursue this fair method of comparison and take into consideration the difference in the weight of the bale for the State that he makes most complaint about—North Carolina—can it be claimed that the Agricultural Department is so very far wrong? Can he fairly contend that the Bureau's estimate is at all wrong? On the contrary, in my deliberate judgment it is a remarkably accurate estimate of the crop in that State. I am told by gentlemen from North Carolina that many of the gins have already been dismantled and that about 98 per cent of the crop has been gathered and that they have practically ceased to gin cotton. In addition, they tell me that the running bale this year is lighter than it was last year, the weight being about 450 pounds per bale. Now, let us apply this method of comparison and note the result:

The Census Bureau's report of cotton ginned up to December 13 shows for North Carolina 598,504 running bales. If the average weight of the running bale in North Carolina this year is 450 pounds, then the equivalent number of 500-pound gross-weight bales ginned up to December 13 is 538,654 bales. The Bureau of Statistics estimated the total production of North Carolina at 545,055 bales of 500 pounds gross weight, and thus you see that in this State the evidence of underestimation is wholly wanting.

I am told by other gentlemen—and I can furnish their names to the gentleman from Massachusetts if desired—that in South Carolina and Georgia the crop has been practically gathered; that there is but a small part of it remaining in the field. Instead of the gentleman from Massachusetts having a basis for the contention that this is an underestimate of the crop, I will say that if one were of a gambling temperament he would be perfectly safe in wagering the gentleman from Massachusetts an amount equal to the value of his largest cotton mill that in the State of Mississippi alone the crop has been overestimated by the Bureau of Statistics to a larger number of bales than it has been underestimated in the three States and one Territory about which he so continuously complains.

Now, there can be no question about this. The gentleman has embodied in his remarks a detailed statement showing the discrepancy between the commercial crop and the estimates of the Agricultural Department. As was so well said by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BOWIE] in his remarks on this subject, the commercial crop includes linters, and it is not comparable with the agricultural crop, which is the actual production for each year, because it is the amount of cotton marketed—sold—and includes cotton brought forward from the previous year as well as the linters, while it does not include cotton remaining unsold. Furthermore, the commercial crop as finally announced and the estimate of the Agricultural Department as announced previous to this year were not made upon the same basis as to the weight of bales, and the gentleman from Massachusetts overlooks all these facts. Hence I say that his comparison is misleading, unjust, and unfair to the Bureau of Statistics. This is another reason I have for stating that the gentleman is laboring under a misapprehension as the facts.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, in order to sustain his assertion of annual underestimation by the Department of Agriculture, presents a table covering the years from 1895 to 1904, inclusive, in which he compares the Bureau's estimates, in bales, with the commercial crop, also in bales, and from this absurd comparison deduces the result that during the series of years covered by the table the underestimate amounted to 7.6 per cent, ranging for the separate years from 1.6 to 14.4 per cent. The fallacy of these figures is self-evident. As has been stated, the Government estimate in years prior to the present one has been expressed in net-weight bales, the weights varying from year to year. The commercial crop was expressed in a different kind of bale entirely; and, furthermore, as I have conclusively shown, the commercial crop is never the agricultural crop; so there is absolutely no comparison to be made between the two sets of figures and the percentages drawn from such comparison are, with due respect to the gentleman from Massachusetts, nothing short of ridiculous.

Take the Department's estimate of December 3, 1904, for the crop of that year. The gentleman from Massachusetts says that the discrepancy between the commercial crop of that year and the estimate given by the Agricultural Department was 10.1 per cent. Now, as a matter of fact, if you adopt a proper basis of comparison, as I have before indicated and which I will embody in these remarks later on, and which even the gentleman from Massachusetts must admit is fair, you will find that the difference between the estimate and the actual crop was about 4 per cent. The gentleman from Massachusetts asserts that the difference is always on one side, or, rather, that the Department's estimates are always underestimates. That, too, is a mistake. I entirely dissent from that proposition. During the last six years the Department has overestimated the crop just as often as it has underestimated it. Notwithstanding this fact, I positively assert that since it has engaged in this work of estimating the cotton crop its annual estimate has proven more accurate—nearer to the actual crop as it is finally ascertained to be—than any estimate coming from any other source.

The best proof of the correctness of this proposition is the fact that the Department's estimate is accepted throughout the commercial world, not only in our own country, but across the seas, as the most impartial and the most accurate estimate of the crop that is made. It is the one estimate that now materially affects the market price of the product; and why? Because everybody believes that it is honest and accurate and impartial, and all accept and act on it as such.

The gentleman contends that the estimate of the crop is made too early in the season, and suggests deferring it until January 1. I protest against the suggestion, because if you defer the report until January 1 it will be of absolutely no value to the producer of cotton. The farmer before this date has parted with the bulk of his crop.

The gentleman from Massachusetts has elsewhere suggested that the report be abandoned. If the Government abandons this field, and it would be tantamount to an abandonment of the field to postpone making the estimate to a later day, what would immediately follow? Every man knows that at once this field would be covered by the professional estimators. And what would then be the consequence? You may take the record from newspapers of our country and you will find that before the Government engaged in this work for a series of years the professional estimator invariably overestimated the crop from three-quarters of a million to a million and a half bales, thereby unfairly depressing the price of cotton, to the great injury of the producer.

Several years ago, before the exhaustive system and methods of gathering cotton statistics had been perfected by the Department of Agriculture, private Pullman-car estimates were yearly precipitated upon the cotton planters of this country by Buston, Neill, and other professional estimators, all of which were manifestly in the interests of the Manchester and Liverpool cotton interests. Frequently these estimates were more than a million bales in excess of the true crop and were shamefully misleading. Now that the Department has perfected its system and has forecasted so closely the true conditions for several years, such estimates made by professional estimators are discredited and ridiculed. The publication by the Department of Agriculture of its cotton estimate has resulted in saving millions of dollars to the American planter and cotton interests.

I beg leave to embody at this point a portion of the last annual report of the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Agriculture, showing conclusive reasons and necessity for the issuing of crop reports by the Government:

The producer should have as good a central crop-reporting agency as the buyer. Since his business is divided into many small noncooperative units, he can not have this without Government aid. The manufacturer, the dealer in actual products, and the consumer also need protection from the speculative manipulation of agencies organized to modify prices temporarily for their own advantage, while the main purpose of crop reports is that the whole people may be benefited by a knowledge of the actual facts which may influence current prices.

A knowledge which covers only parts of the area of a given crop is misleading, because to judge for the entire unit area from local conditions alone gives a wrong basis, and the producer and others interested need a knowledge of the crop of entire area expressed as a total. Reports covering part of an area, or covering the area definitely only in parts, may be used by self-interested crop-reporting agencies to mislead. The reporting agency, in order to enable those interested as producers, consumers, or dealers to recognize the conditions in the entire crop area, must resolve all the facts into quantitative statements, preferably a single numerical statement, as of yield for the entire area, and the market must then resolve the balances between supply and demand into current prices. Only by "weighting" reports from each district—that is, by giving to each partial report only that arithmetic weight which the acreage in the area covered by the partial report demands—and assembling the whole into one statement can the crop estimator accurately report for the whole area. Such definite forms of statement have the advantage of placing the reporting agency under responsibility to attain accuracy, also of being easily interpreted by all parties, and they are capable of comparison from month to month or from year to year or with averages for the previous ten years.

The Bureau of Statistics, acting as a disinterested agency, has assumed the task of keeping the farmers, the dealers, and the users of farm products informed, and the general acceptance of its estimates in deciding prices is the only proof needed to establish the reasonable accuracy of these estimates. Its reports of conditions and its estimates, used by markets in establishing current prices, have become a necessary part of our domestic trade and our foreign business. These monthly reports serve as guides to all intermediate reports from whatever source, which, without this monthly basis, would be too local and partial to be of much value.

NECESSITY FOR CROP REPORTS.

The purposes of the Government's reports on acreage, condition, or quantity of agricultural products promised throughout the season, and on quantity and prices of farm products actually produced, may be enumerated as follows:

1. To give information to producers, consumers, and dealers of actual yields; also to report the actual conditions of promise of crops.
2. To enable market centers better to balance supply against demand in defining current prices warranted by natural conditions.
3. To insure whatever stability of prices a changing state of natural conditions allows.
4. To be so certainly authentic and so comprehensive and definite for entire crop areas that interested agencies can not well discredit nor warp the figures with their own estimates, and thus make wrong prices and unstable markets.
5. To enable producers to know the facts as to the promise of prices for their crops, that false reports may not mislead them into early sales at prices wrongly made too low.
6. To create confidence, that sales and consignments by producers may be made more freely, that dealers may more safely conduct their business with lower handling charges, and that manufacturers and other consumers may more freely purchase stocks to hold, thus adding certainty and stability to their business, that they may work on a less speculative basis, and thus bring more equitable returns from labor and expenditure to all interested.
7. To make reports so frequently and give facts so soon after changes in prospective conditions occur, or so soon after actual yields are harvested, that the least possible element of uncertainty or speculative condition may prevail to remove prices from their normal economic place.
8. To give production by localities or crop areas, and to give local market demands, so that producers may know to which market to sell and so that buyers may know where best to secure supplies, thus to equalize prices and to avoid loss from very low prices, as in case of heavy production of perishable products.

As I have said, if the Government now abandons this field it will again be immediately covered by professional estimators and the farmer who makes this cotton will again become the victim of constant overestimation of his crop.

But to return to the contention of the gentleman from Massachusetts that the Government estimate is inaccurate: In all fairness, when you consider that he directs his complaint against the returns of three States and one Territory, and then finds a discrepancy of only 21,784 bales and reaches this conclusion by actually proceeding upon a false basis, you must begin to appreciate upon what flimsy ground he has to stand when he seeks to discredit the Bureau of Statistics by requiring it to make a new estimate to be issued at a date when it can be of no value.

Now, if he goes to the other nine States and the remaining Territory on the list, he can not show a single instance where there is even slight evidence of the probability of an underestimate of the crop. Why, gentlemen, in the State of Mississippi—I cite Mississippi because I have heretofore referred to it—the Government's estimate indicates a crop of 1,212,846 bales. That was the Government's estimate issued by the Bureau of Statistics on December 4. The census in the ginners' report giving the amount ginned up to December 1 showed that there had been ginned only 840,729 bales. A comparison of the two reports shows that about 400,000 bales must yet be ginned subsequent to December 1 before the Government's estimate of the crop is reached—practically one-third of the crop in that State yet to be ginned. Any man who has practical knowledge of cotton and cotton growing will tell you that there was not one-third of the cotton in the fields of Mississippi on December 1. It is true the ginning in Mississippi is much later than in other States, and this fact explains in part the divergence above pointed out; but when you consider the further fact that on December 13 the census ginners' reports showed that there had been ginned in Mississippi only 949,203 bales, and consider in connection therewith that to the same date in 1902, 1903, and 1904 there had been ginned, respectively, 78.2 per cent, 84.1 per cent, and 79.8 per cent of the total crop, you can't escape the conclusion, notwithstanding the comparison is being made between running bales and bales of 500 pounds gross weight, that the crop here is overestimated rather than underestimated.

Now, take Arkansas. According to the Government's estimate it will make this year 618,463 bales of cotton; but the ginners' report shows that on December 1 422,813 bales have been ginned, or approximately 200,000 bales yet in the field, and on December 13 only 474,350 bales had been ginned. It is patent that this estimate is too high. The gentleman completely ignores such facts as these when he comes to present to you his contention that there has been an underestimate of the cotton crop by the Department.

The gentleman from Massachusetts attempts, in another table which he presents, to reduce the running bales as reported by the Census Bureau as having been ginned up to December 13 to equivalent 500-pound bales by using the average weight of this year's bales as reported by the New Orleans Cotton Exchange, and places the figures thus obtained in comparison with the Bureau's estimate. Now, with all due respect to the New Orleans Cotton Exchange, I direct attention to the fact that last season this same exchange, through its accomplished secretary, Mr. Henry G. Hester, computed the average gross weight of the commercial bale marketed between March 1, 1904 and March 1, 1905, at 519.87 pounds. The Census Bureau, in its final report for last year, showed the average gross weight per bale, counting round bales as half bales, to have been less than 500 pounds. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will consult Bulletin No. 19, issued by the Census Bureau under date of April 25, 1905, entitled "Quantity of Cotton Ginned in the United States," he will find, on page 10 thereof, the average gross weight per bale as estimated by the New Orleans Cotton Exchange and the average gross weight per bale, counting round bales as half bales, as actually established by the Census Bureau, the latter figures being based on reports obtained from local cotton weighers in each county. This year the New Orleans Cotton Exchange fixes the average gross weight per bale for the entire cotton belt at 519.1 pounds.

If last year's inaccuracy can be taken as a criterion, this year's estimate by the exchange is also worthless, and so this comparison by the gentleman from Massachusetts likewise utterly fails and is misleading. Again, I state that I accord the gentleman absolute honesty and sincerity of purpose in persisting in his effort to secure the adoption of his resolution, but I also believe, as I have heretofore said, that he is laboring under a misapprehension of facts. It may be that he has been blinded by self-interest, which he has so candidly confessed; it may be that the gentleman, who is one of the largest cotton spinners, has failed to provide himself with cotton to use in his mills during the coming season, believing that there was to be a twelve or thirteen million bale crop. I feel sure he was of this belief, for in the beginning of this season, while on a visit to New York, the newspapers reported that he estimated the crop at 13,000,000 bales, and this estimate of his was announced on the floor of the New York Cotton Exchange. It may be that these facts and these circumstances have blinded the gentleman so that he can not see conditions as they really are; but, gentlemen, when you consider all the facts in connection with the matter, you who have no such interests can not escape the conclusion that the estimate made by the Government on December 4 is fairly accurate, and I feel quite sure that everyone believes that it was an honest estimate. I believe that the size of the crop, as finally announced, is going to be approximately close to the estimate of the Department, and I believe that, as a whole, the ginners' reports bear it out. I will submit here the actual figures and you will find that there is a discrepancy of only a small per cent between the Government's estimate and the actual crop as it has been found to be at the end of the cotton season for the last six years.

Number of pounds of lint cotton produced in the United States (exclusive of linters), as estimated by the Department of Agriculture and as subsequently reported by the Census Bureau, for the years 1899 to 1904, inclusive.

[d] Overestimate by Bureau of Statistics, 0.4 per cent.
[e] Overestimate by Bureau of Statistics, 3.9 per cent.

You will notice how marvelously close, with the exception of last year, the estimates of the Bureau, when reduced to pounds, are to the actual number of pounds reported by the Census Bureau at the end of each season as having been produced, and even last year the report was only a trifle over 4 per cent out of the way. You will also notice that in three of the years the Bureau's figures were overestimates and that in three other years they were underestimates. The total divergence for the entire period of six years is less than 1 per cent, as has been shown by the statement heretofore made by my friend the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BOWIE].

The gentleman from Massachusetts makes reference to an alleged statement by the former Statistician of the Department, Mr. John Hyde, as reported by the Manchester Guardian, in which he is reported to have said: "There is not the slightest doubt that the correspondents of the Department have combined to mislead, and that the actual crop will prove to be not far from 11,000,000 bales. The Department's correspondents always underestimate the crop, and this year the enormous influence of the Southern Cotton Growers' Association has been brought to bear upon them with the object of inducing them to deliberately misrepresent the actual condition." The gentleman from Massachusetts appears to think that this statement is conclusive, as he says: "Mr. Hyde is in the best position to appreciate and weigh the reports of the southern correspondents at their exact value." Now, an examination of the table which I have just presented shows that the southern correspondents do not always underestimate the crop. The estimates of the Bureau are based on the reports of the southern correspondents, and it appears that during the past six years there were three underestimates and three overestimates by the Bureau.

When Mr. Hyde severed his connection with the Department of Agriculture, on account of ill health, and went to Europe he was in a very depressed and pessimistic condition. I have reason to know that he was then imbued with the idea that a conspiracy existed throughout the entire South to mislead the Bureau and cause the public to believe that this year's crop is smaller than it actually is. He left this country with that idea in his mind, and as he has been completely out of touch since then with the current events the same ideas are probably still entertained by him; but he is utterly mistaken, and the fact that this statement purporting to come from him is issued at Manchester, England, and is published in a paper devoted to the interest of the English cotton spinners is quite significant. It clearly indicates to me that the former Statistician is identifying himself with the spinning interest and will in all probability soon enter upon the rôle of a professional cotton-crop estimator. This class always contends that the Government estimate is inaccurate, and frequently contends when the crop is short that it should be entirely abandoned.

Consider just for a moment what is the highest test one can apply to show the virtue of these estimates of the cotton crop made by the Government. The American people are the smartest, shrewdest people on earth. I do not say that with any vanity—I believe it; they are the shrewdest people in business affairs on this mundane sphere, and the fact that they accept and act on the Government's estimate of the cotton crop is high evidence to my mind that it is the estimate nearest the truth or the exact facts.

This year's estimate indicates a small crop, and the gentleman from Massachusetts complains that the report is inaccurate. If he has complained heretofore I have not heard of it, but I recall that last year when the report was being denounced from every section of the South, when it was believed by some that the crop had been overestimated more than 600,000 bales, I stood here and contended that all the producer of cotton wanted was to secure an impartial and honest estimate; if I remember correctly the gentleman and I were in accord at that time. I believe now that this is what the gentleman wishes.

I insist on believing that he is laboring under a misapprehension of facts in regard to this matter. I believe it, and accord to him absolute honesty when he says he wants this new estimate; but I believe there is no necessity for it, and not only is there no necessity for it, but it would occasion a waste of money, and, if issued, could only serve to depress the price of cotton, and hence would be a grievous wrong to millions of people who grow and are interested in the price of this great staple.

The table I have presented successfully controverts the accuracy of the gentleman's figures as to the estimates and the actual crops for the last six years; beyond that I can not go, as there are no figures prior to 1899 of the actual production similar to those issued since then by the Census Bureau. Prior to 1899 we can only compare commercial crops, which, as I have before stated, are not at all comparable with the agricultural production.

The gentleman from Massachusetts has also spoken of the comparative profits made by the growers and manufacturers of cotton. He asserts that the producer of cotton realizes very large profits for his year's labor, but that the manufacturer of cotton, on the contrary, makes a very small per cent on his investment. This contention of his was thoroughly thrashed out the other day when his resolution was before the Committee on Agriculture for its consideration, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON], replying to this phase of the gentleman's argument, conclusively demonstrated that he was entirely mistaken. I insist now that the farmer who is engaged in growing cotton makes no such profits as the gentleman has stated, and, in fact, is one class which, until the last year or two, has had but little share in the great prosperity about which we hear so much. On the contrary, the cotton manufacturers—if trade journals are to be believed—have been enlarging their plants, increasing their output, extending their trade, and giving every evidence of a most profitable industry.

But, gentlemen, whether I am right or the gentleman from Massachusetts is right on this issue, what bearing has it on the real issue raised by the gentleman's resolution? Is the last estimate of the cotton crop by the Agricultural Department fairly accurate and should the Department be required to revise it?

The gentleman from Massachusetts presented, in substance, these same arguments in support of his resolution to the Committee on Agriculture, to which body same had been referred, and that great committee, made up of Representatives in Congress from every section of our country, after giving the gentleman a patient hearing, by a unanimous vote refused to report his resolution, which could only discredit the estimate against which the gentleman complains. I confidently believe that it has been shown that the gentleman proceeds upon an untenable basis in order to reach his conclusion that the crop has been underestimated by the Agricultural Department.

The gentleman has made specific criticism of the methods employed by the Department of Argiculture in making the crop estimate. The system and methods of gathering statistics by the Department of Agriculture are scientific, comprehensive, and consistent. They are not the product of a night, but have been perfected and evolved for forty-five years, until they have reached during the past several years the highest degree of perfection and accuracy obtainable by statistics. In this connection I beg leave to incorporate in my remarks parts of the last annual report of the Bureau of Statistics, which gives in detail these methods. This report likewise appears in the supplement to the December Crop Reporter of the Department of Agriculture and also in the body of the Secretary's report, and is thereby distributed throughout the entire United States in editions of several hundred thousands. There is every evidence on the part of the officials of this Department to show clearly and frankly the scientific methods by which they arrive at their reports:

METHODS OF CROP REPORTING.

The Bureau of Statistics issues each month detailed reports relating to agricultural conditions throughout the United States, the data upon which these statements are based being obtained through a special field service, a corps of State statistical agents, and through a very large body of voluntary correspondents composed of the following classes: County correspondents, township correspondents, individual farmers, and special cotton correspondents.

A special field service is composed of ten traveling agents, each assigned to report for a given group of States. They are especially qualified by statistical training and practical knowledge of crops. They systematically travel over the districts assigned to them, carefully note the development of each crop, and keep in close touch with best informed opinion, and render written and telegraphic reports monthly and at such other times as is required.

The State statistical agents are paid agents located in forty-three of the States. Each of these reports for his State as a unit and maintains a corps of correspondents entirely independent of those reporting directly to the Department at Washington. These State statistical aids report each month direct to the State agent on schedules furnished them. These are then tabulated and weighted according to the relative product or area of the given crop in each county represented and summarized for the use of the State agent. Then he coordinates and analyzes them in the light of his own knowledge of conditions, derived from personal observation and other sources, and prepares his monthly and other written and telegraphic reports to the Department.

There are in the United States approximately 2,700 counties of agricultural importance. In each of these counties the Department has a principal county correspondent, who maintains an organization of several assistants. These county correspondents are selected with special reference to their qualifications and constitute an efficient branch of the crop-reporting service. They make the county the geographical unit of their reports, and, after obtaining data each month from their assistants and supplementing this with information obtained from their own observation and knowledge, they report directly to the Department at Washington.

In the township and voting precincts in the United States in which farming operations are extensively carried on the Department has township correspondents, who make such township or precinct the basis of their reports, which they also send to the Bureau of Statistics each month.

Finally, at the end of the growing season, a large number of individual farmers and planters report on the results of their own individual farming operations during the year.

With regard to cotton, any information at hand is supplemented by that furnished by special cotton correspondents, embracing a large number of persons intimately concerned in the cotton industry.

SCOPE OF CROP REPORTS.

Eleven reports on the principal crops are received each year from special field agents, from county correspondents, from State statistical agents, and from township correspondents, and one report relating to the acreage and production of general crops is received during the year from individual farmers.

Six special cotton reports are received during the growing season from the special field agents, from the county correspondents, from the State statistical agents, and from township correspondents, and the first and last of these reports are supplemented by returns from individual farmers, special correspondents, and a list of cotton ginners kindly supplied this Bureau by the Census Bureau of the Department of Commerce and Labor.

Special cotton schedules are sent out each month during the growing season. The May schedule deals with the acreage and condition of cotton. The June, July, and September schedules deal exclusively with the condition of cotton. The August schedule deals with the condition of cotton and the amount of old cotton on hand. The November schedule deals with the average yield per acre of cotton, the abandoned acreage, if any, and the cost of picking.

METHODS OF HANDLING REPORTS.

Just previous to the issuing of the monthly reports, the several different corps of correspondents send their reports separately and distinctly to the Department at Washington.

The reports of special field agents and State statistical agents residing at points more than 500 miles distant from Washington are sent by telegraph, in cipher, to the Secretary of Agriculture, by whom they are placed in a safe located in his private office, to which there is no access until the day on which the report is issued.

In order to prevent any possible access to reports which relate to speculative crops, and to render it absolutely impossible for premature information to be derived from them, all of the reports from the State statistical agents, as well as those of the special field agents relating thereto, are sent to the Secretary of Agriculture in specially prepared envelopes, addressed in red ink, with the letter "A" plainly marked on the ends. By an arrangement with the postal authorities, these envelopes are delivered to the Secretary of Agriculture in sealed mail pouches. These pouches are opened only by the Secretary or Assistant Secretary and the reports, with seals unbroken, immediately placed in the safe in the Secretary's office, where they remain sealed until the morning of the day on which the reports are issued, when they are delivered to the Statistician by the Secretary or the Assistant Secretary. The combination for opening the safe in which such documents are kept is known only to the Secretary and the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture.

Reports from the State statistical agents and special field agents in relation to nonspeculative crops are sent in similar red, addressed envelopes, marked "B," which go to the Bureau of Statistics and are kept secured in a safe until the data contained in them are used by the Statistician in computing estimates regarding the crops to which they relate. The reports from the county correspondents, township correspondents, and other voluntary agents are sent to the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics by mail in sealed envelopes. The figures reported are transferred from the schedules to large tabulating sheets, where they are given proper arithmetical weight according to the acreage or production of the county or agricultural unit they represent. State averages are then determined and the computations verified. All these reports are tabulated in separate sections working in separate rooms, and, to guard against any individual drawing deductions from the results shown for any State or States tabulated by him, the chief of the division numbers the tabulation sheets at the top where the name of the State to which they relate appears and cuts off and omits groups of counties marked with the number, so that there is nothing to show the State to which any figures pertain. After having been worked up by different clerks in other rooms from those in which they are tabulated and partially added, they are delivered by the chief of the division to the Statistician, who assembles the sheets for final computation.

METHODS OF PREPARING REPORTS.

For the purpose of checking up the results of the several sources of information and reducing the possibility of error to a minimum, the final results are made up by a crop-reporting board composed of the Chief Statistician, or Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, as chairman, and four individual members, made up of statisticians and officials in the Bureau and members of the special field service called to Washington on report days for that purpose. Thus the plan is to select this board of four members each report day from an available corps of six or eight men well trained and thoroughly informed as to crop conditions and as to the relative value and correctness of the reports from the different corps of correspondents. This board, with several expert computers, meets on report days in the office of the Statistician, which is kept locked and no one allowed to enter or leave it. All telephones are disconnected.

After the assembling of the board, all reports by States from the several distinct corps of correspondents are brought together in convenient form in parallel columns on final tabulation slips, and the board is thus provided with several separate estimates covering the same territory and the same crops, made by the respective corps of correspondents, each reporting for a territory with which he is thoroughly familiar. There are also prepared for the board abstracts of the reports of each crop by States from the weekly Weather Crop Bulletins of the Weather Bureau issued during the month. With all these data before them, each individual member of the board computes separately his own estimate of each crop by States. These reports are then compared and discussed by the board under the supervision of the chairman, and the final figures by States are decided upon. It is interesting to remark how often the reports of the different corps of correspondents very nearly approach or equal each other, and how often the final figures arrived at by the individual members of the board agree with each other. These State estimates, which are in percentages, are then multiplied into the acreages for their respective States. The sum of these products is divided by the sum of the acreages, giving the percentage for the entire crop for the United States.

METHOD OF ISSUING REPORTS.

Reports in relation to cotton thus prepared by the crop-reporting board are issued on the 3d of each month during the growing season, and reports relating to the principal farm crops and live stock are prepared and made public on the 10th day of each month. In order that the information contained in these reports may be made available simultaneously throughout the entire United States, and that one part of the country may not have the advantage over another, they are simultaneously handed, at a given hour, as at 12 o'clock noon or at 4 o'clock p. m. on report days, to all applicants and to the Western Union Telegraph Company and the Postal Telegraph-Cable Company for transmission to the exchanges and to the press. These companies have reserved their lines at the designated time, and by use of a "flash" forward immediately the figures of most interest. A mimeograph statement also containing such estimates of condition or actual production, together with the corresponding estimates of former years, for comparative purposes, is prepared and sent to a mailing list of exchanges, newspaper publications, and individuals. The same afternoon, printed cards containing the essential facts concerning the most important crops of the report are mailed to the 77,000 post-offices throughout the United States for public display, thus placing the most available information within the farmers' immediate reach.

Promptly after the issuing of the report, it, together with other statistical information of value to the farmer and the country at large, is published in the Crop Reporter, an eight-page publication of the Bureau of Statistics, under the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture. An edition of over 100,000 of this Reporter is distributed to the correspondents and other interested parties throughout the United States each month.

WORK OF THE YEAR—CHANGE IN METHODS.

A crop-reporting board, composed of a chairman and four members, as noted above, has been appointed, with entire jurisdiction over all crop reports and estimates made by the Bureau.

Thus when the final results obtained from the several corps of correspondents are assembled on report days, the Department's figures are determined by employing the judgment of several experts instead of a single individual. This has been generally accepted as a marked improvement in the crop service. The Weather Crop Bulletins of the Weather Bureau are also used by the Bureau in the preparation of its estimates.

In order to render doubly secure and secret the confidential information contained in the monthly crop reports, stringent orders governing their preparation have been promulgated and are strictly observed governing the "Methods of preparing reports," referred to earlier in this report.

A very great improvement has been made in the special field service, by districting the United States and assigning each of the respective field agents to a definite group of States, which they thoroughly travel over and report on each month. The cotton-producing States have thus been redistricted and the service augmented and perfected there by the appointment of two new agents.

Mr. Chairman, the manufacturing centers of foreign countries and the United States are dependent upon us for their raw product—cotton. To meet these great demands at home and abroad is the mission of the American cotton planter. The manufacturer, the merchant, the factory operative at home and abroad, to as great an extent as the cotton planter, should be deeply interested in monthly reports of the condition and progress of a product upon which all these classes are dependent. Census methods gather statistical information slowly. At no time does it make an estimate of the crop, and its final report, giving size of the crop, is not issued until the ginning season is closed. In the meantime the important crop has been picked, ginned, and marketed; and if the Government should abandon the work being done by the Bureau of Statistics of the Agricultural Department the producer of cotton would have no information as to the size of the crop except what certain interests obtain and publish through agencies in which the farmer and public are not regarded as being concerned. All interests, therefore, demand that the true condition of the cotton crop should be made known promptly, to the end that the farmer may get a fair and honest price for his product and harmful speculation may be discouraged. To remedy these evils and to protect these interests, Congress, away back in 1862, provided for the issuing of monthly crop reports, and to-day this developed and perfected crop-reporting agency in the Department of Agriculture stands as a bulwark against the domination of speculators in this country and abroad and as a protection to the cotton planter of the South and allied industries.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, of course the gentleman from New York does not know what a severe blow he has struck the country [applause and laughter] in refusing me permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD. I did desire briefly, but I can not do it now, to state the reasons for the vote I shall give on this matter, for I am advised that if a new Member approaches a subject with becoming modesty he may, without subjecting himself to the charge of undue forwardness, explain briefly the reasons that impel him to vote on an important matter that is discussed in his district as in all other districts. I did desire to state the reasons that would impel me to vote upon the particular matter of where that portion of the President's message relating to the insurance question should be referred.

I understand that the amendment which is to be proposed to the amendment will take the form of referring that part of the President's message touching insurance to the Judiciary Committee, with the request that that committee make a report to the House whether, in their opinion, the Congress has constitutional rights or legal rights to extend national jurisdiction over this particular business, and, if so, along what lines it may move. I shall vote for that amendment to the resolution, because, first, Mr. Chairman, I am constrained to believe that the language of the message itself submits to this House a question purely legal in character, which (although I confess to a very limited understanding of the rules and the precedents here in the House) would, according to what I do understand of them, necessarily carry it to the committee of this House which has to pass upon legal questions as its primary function. I shall vote for it in the next place, Mr. Chairman, because I believe from a legal and constitutional standpoint this body has no right to extend its legislative power over this particular business, and that to do so would be an interference with the authority, the power, and function of the States, and I should like to have the mature opinion of the able lawyers on the Judiciary Committee as to that. Or, Mr. Chairman, even if I be mistaken as to that, there is at least a prima facie case against the extension of the authority of the United States—that is to say, if the decisions of the Supreme Court themselves constitute prima facie evidence that that is the law which they say is the law. I know, of course, that there are gentlemen who concur with the boy who, when he was being examined for his law license, and was asked the broad question, "What is law?" replied, "It is the last guess of the Supreme Court;" but as a general proposition, Mr. Chairman, I think the Congress of the United States has been rather inclined to adopt the doctrine of stare decisis, and, to say the least of it, the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States that insurance is not interstate commerce would be a prima facie case against legislation enacted here to control it as such, and it would result in uncertainty and in doubt as to what particular authority should exercise its control over the corporations, societies, or organizations engaged in the insurance business, and, I believe, Mr. Chairman, that this is peculiarly a business which should be under the exclusive operation of either one power or the other.

I believe that if there be a division of authority it will result in one power standing and waiting for the other power to act, or it will result in a contest between the two powers, and from that contest or from that fight the insurance companies themselves will be the only ones who will derive benefit. In other words, Mr. Chairman, it will be a case of refusing or evading the question, or else it will be as a case of quarreling between two teachers as to who shall whip a boy, and while they are quarreling the boy will leave and go about his business. I vote for it, therefore, Mr. Chairman, because, prima facie at least, the legal phase, if nothing more, is against us, and I believe that while the issues were being made up to try the lawsuits to determine whether this body had power the question, if left to the States themselves, would be settled. Of course what I am saying does not apply to any bills touching the right of Federal control here in the District of Columbia and in the Territories, for only Congress can control in these; but in so far as interstate control is concerned, it is believed that the most effective way that this body can deal with that proposition, that the method which will bring the best results, the method which will bring the quickest action, will be to give a clear-cut, ringing, decisive "no" to the question of whether we shall interfere with the control that may, without legal doubt, be exercised by the States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I again renew my request that I be permitted to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that he may extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I think we will deal out equal and exact justice, so I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. GILLESPIE. I will yield to the gentleman as much time as the gentleman needs to conclude his remarks.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. GARRETT. I yield to the gentleman from New York to make the motion that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Texas that the gentleman from New York moved that the committee rise, which takes precedence over the offer of the gentleman to yield part of his time, the gentleman not having the floor at the time he made the offer.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BUTLER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House resolution 42, and had come to no resolution thereon.

COUNCIL CITY AND SOLOMON RIVER RAILROAD.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], who objected to the consideration of House bill No. 99, now withdraws his objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The bill has been already reported.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; and it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LLOYD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 54 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Thursday, December 21, 1905, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 21, 1905.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD E. HALE.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. TELLER, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

SENATOR FROM OREGON.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, I desire at this time to present the credentials of my colleague from Oregon, appointed by the governor of that State to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of the late Senator Mitchell.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The credentials will be received and read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read the credentials, as follows:

STATE OF OREGON,
Executive Department:

SALEM, December 13, 1905.

The Governor of Oregon to John M. Gearin, of the City of Portland, State of Oregon:

Whereas on the 8th day of December, 1905, the seat of the Hon. John H. Mitchell, one of the Senators of the United States from the State of Oregon, became vacant by reason of his death; and

Whereas there has been no session of the legisiture of this State at which such vacancy could be filled by the election of a Senator to succeed the said John H. Mitchell; and

Whereas it is of vital importance to the interests of the State and nation that such vacancy be filled:

Now, therefore, be it known that, reposing special trust and confidence in the capacity, integrity, and fidelity of John M. Gearin, a citizen of the State of Oregon, I, George E. Chamberlain, governor of the State of Oregon, do in the name and by the authority of said State, by these presents appoint and commission him, the said John M. Gearin, to be a United States Senator to fill the place made vacant by the death of the said John H. Mitchell and to occupy the same until a successor shall be duly elected.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the State to be affixed, at the city of Salem, on this 13th day of December, 1905.

GEO. E. CHAMBERLAIN, Governor.

By the governor:
[SEAL.] F. I. DUNBAR, Secretary of State.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, I would suggest to the Senator that the certificate, as I understood from its reading at the desk, is defective in that it provides that Mr. Gearin is appointed until his successor is elected. The governor has no power to make such an appointment. I will examine the certificate, however, and confer with the Senator. It can be very easily corrected, but I think as it stands it is fatally defective.

Mr. FULTON. Is there objection to my colleague being sworn in at this time?

Mr. BURROWS. I did not know that Mr. Gearin is present. I think under the circumstances I should object to the oath of office being administered because of the defect in the certificate. A certificate appointing a person a Senator until his successor is elected seems to me to be defective.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I am very clearly of the opinion, in concurrence with the Senator from Michigan, that the last clause of this commission, "and to occupy the same until a successor shall be duly elected," is in excess of constitutional authority. It is, however, mere surplusage, for the Constitution provides how long a Senator appointed by the governor to fill a vacancy may hold the appointment. If the appointment in itself to fill a vacancy is complete and in accordance with the constitutional provision, whatever is added going to the duration of the term is utterly unnecessary, and if in violation of it is a mere matter of surplusage, not going to the validity, it seems to me, of the appointment.

We have had, I think, a similar case within my recollection. There was a vacancy—that is not disputed—occasioned by the death of Senator Mitchell, which is sought in this appointment to be filled. It is recited that the vacancy happened in a vacation, while the legislature was not in session, and the governor says:

> Now, therefore, be it known that, reposing special trust and confidence in the capacity, integrity, and fidelity of John M. Gearin, a citizen of the State of Oregon, I, George E. Chamberlain, governor of the State of Oregon, do, in the name and by the authority of said State, by these presents appoint and commission him, the said John M. Gearin, to be a United States Senator to fill the place made vacant by the death of the said John H. Mitchell.

If the last clause, following that I have just read, were omitted, that, I submit to the Senator from Michigan, is a complete and valid evidence of the appointment of Mr. Gearin by the governor of Oregon, and I think that the Senate ought to disregard entirely the unnecessary and altogether impotent words which occur at the end of the commission. I make that suggestion to my friend from Michigan.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, I only desired to call the attention of the Senate to the defect in the certificate. Of course that portion of the certificate which declares that Mr. Gearin is appointed to fill the vacancy until his successor is elected may be regarded as surplusage, if the certificate in other particulars clearly shows that the executive of the State had the power to make the appointment.

The certificate is defective in another particular. The governor says that he appoints the person named to "fill the vacancy." He has no power to do that. The Constitution provides that the executive of the State, in such a case as the present, "may make a temporary appointment until the next meeting of the legislaure, which shall then fill the vacancy." But I do not care to be hypercritical about it at all. I simply call the attention of the Senate to the defects in the certificate.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator does not make an objection?

Mr. BURROWS. Oh, no; I shall make no objection. I only desired to call the attention of the Senate to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection——

Mr. TELLER. I can not give the exact date, but the Senate heretofore passed on just such a case as this, and the Senator appointed was sworn in. I suggest that the newly appointed Senator from Oregon be sworn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator appointed from Oregon will present himself at the Vice-President's desk and take the oath prescribed by law.

Mr. Gearin was escorted to the Vice-President's desk by Mr. FULTON; and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

COUNCIL CITY AND SOLOMON RIVER RAILROAD COMPANY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives and calls the attention of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] to it.

The bill (H. R. 99) to aid the Council City and Solomon River Railroad Company was read the first time by its title.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, that bill being in the nature of an emergency measure should be passed at once in order to do any good at all. I ask for its present consideration.

The facts in the case are substantially these. There is a railroad being constructed from a point on Solomon River up on the eastern portion of Seward Peninsula, in Alaska. Seward Peninsula is the peninsula where Nome is situated. There is a law requiring all railroads in Alaska to pay a tax of $100 a mile. Last year Congress, in order to promote the building of this railroad in that difficult and inclement country, relieved the company of the tax upon the condition that they would complete 20 miles within a year. The railroad company have already completed 18½ miles, and they were unable to go any farther because of the early advent of frost and cold weather and the difficulty of getting in the materials. Their time expires the 31st of this month, and in order that they may not suffer any hardship the bill is simply to give them an extension of one year within which to complete it.

Seward Peninsula is the bleakest part of Alaska. There is no timber, and everything in the way of material and supplies has to be imported there for the construction of the railroad. The company are building a standard-gauge railroad wholly with their own means. They are not peddling stock anywhere. I think they are entitled to this encouragement. If we are to give them this relief, the bill ought to pass now, because the time will be out on the 31st of this month. The bill simply extends the time one year.

Mr. GORMAN. Let the bill be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time of the Council City and Solomon River Railroad Company to comply with the provisions of sections 4 and 5 of chapter 299 of the laws of the United States, entitled "An act extending the homestead laws and providing for the right of way for railroads in the district of Alaska, and for other purposes," approved May 14, 1898, in acquiring and completing its railroad now under construction in Alaska, is hereby extended as follows:

First. That the time to file the map and profile of definite location of its first section of at least 20 miles with the register of the land office in the district of Alaska, as provided in said sections 4 and 5, is hereby extended to and including the 31st day of December, 1906.

Second. That the time to complete the first section of at least 20 miles of its railroad, as provided in said section 5, is hereby extended to and including the 31st day of December, 1906, and the time for completing its entire railroad, as provided in said section 5, is hereby extended to and including December 31, 1909.

Third. That it shall be lawful for the Council City and Solomon River Railroad Company to hereafter operate its railroad in the district of Alaska for a period to and including December 31, 1909, without the payment of the license fee of $100 per mile per annum on each mile operated, as provided in section 29 of chapter 1 of the act entitled "An act for making further provision for a civil government for Alaska, and for other purposes," approved June 6, 1900.

The Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, our Heavenly Father, from whom all blessings are, we recognize in Thy son, Jesus Christ, who brought to light life and immortality and taught us the beauty of holiness, Thine own best gift to the world, whose advent will be celebrated with joy and gladness, thanksgiving and praise, in every home throughout the length and breadth of Christendom; and as we strive to imitate Thee in gifts to our friends and kindred we most fervently pray that we may not forget in our generosity the downtrodden, the outcast, homeless, and poor, especially the children in poverty, bereft of friends and kindred, remembering that "Twice blest is he who gives." And now, O God, our Heavenly Father, keep us close to Thee as we separate for this holiday season to go to our several homes, that we enter not into temptation, and bring us together again at the appointed time in health, strength, and vigor. In the name of Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

REGULATION OF NATURALIZATION.

Mr. CULLOM. I have a memorial sent to me from the Civic Federation of Chicago on the subject of naturalization. It is a pretty important paper and it is signed by important men. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and that it be printed as a document in addition. It is a short paper.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed as a document and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and the House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Having observed for a number of years the methods followed by the courts in the city of Chicago in granting naturalization to aliens, and believing that changes in these methods are desirable more effectually to carry out the intent of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States in relation to naturalization, the Civic Federation of Chicago begs leave respectfully to submit to your honorable body this brief memorial, with the hope that our testimony may emphasize the necessity of prompt legislation on the subject as has been recommended in the reports of the Secretary of State and the Attorney-General.

While the evils resulting from lax and often illegal customs throughout the country of granting citizenship to foreigners has long been common knowledge, and is exposed in the report of the special examiner whose investigations, under the direction of the Attorney-General, covered many States of the Union, our conclusions are based on the conditions as we find them in our own city.

A careful examination of the court records, as well as personal observation of the manner of conducting naturalization both in preliminary and final hearings, shows that the procedure is subject to grave criticisms. This is especially true of periods immediately preceding national elections. The laws, inadequate as they are, have been violated both in spirit and in letter and the institution for the granting of citizenship to the worthy utilized by the various political organizations for the making of partisan voters.

The causes for these deplorable conditions are several, and in our observations we hesitate to accuse either courts or politicians. The situation makes the result inevitable, and we have no doubt that both judges and party organizations would gladly be free from the pressure that is upon them through lack of legal restrictions. We judge this from the fact that, so far as we can learn, the two principal political parties, after much work and expense through their organizations, achieve in a given contest about equal results in securing new adherents, and therefore are relatively of the same political strength they were at the beginning.

As an indication of the wholesale and ill-directed manner in which voters are created we submit the following data:

October 13 and 14, 1904, in circuit court, aliens and minors		700
October 3, 1904, in circuit court, aliens and minors		299

On October 8, 1904, one judge appears by the records to have naturalized 344 men. On the same day another judge appears by the records to have performed 201 naturalizations. The 1,162 naturalizations of the circuit court for the day were by eleven judges.

At the time the special examiner for the Government visited Chicago he declared that the criminal court was without authority to grant naturalization, as it was not a court of common-law jurisdiction. Since that time the criminal court has issued no certificates of citizenship to aliens, although this court had previously, from the year it was created under the State constitution of 1870, done a full share of the naturalization work of the county, its heaviest years having been 1896, when it granted about 12,000 final papers.

We would not assert that all of the evils of reckless and illegal naturalization that are possible under the present lax system are found here, yet all of the judges and clerks of the courts interviewed in our investigation agreed that conditions have been and are extremely bad, and in some instances scandalous. For example, it has been the custom for the political parties to deposit a sum of money—frequently $500 or $1,000—in the office of the clerk of a court to be drawn against for fees as the candidates for final papers were rounded up and brought in during the few weeks before elections. During these times usually two or three judges are selected to sit at night for this special work, when one or the other of the principal political committees pays the clerks in the office of the clerk of the court for the extra work. So great has been the stress sometimes that these night sessions have lasted until after midnight. There is an entire lack of solemnity or dignity attending the formalities, and in thousands of instances, as we are well convinced, the men who are thus made citizens have little or no comprehension of the responsibilities imposed upon them. Questions are put rapidly and perfunctorily and the answers are often unintelligible.

Some improvement has been noted since the passage of the act of 1903, under which two witnesses are required; but frequently they are professional witnesses and answer for a large number, when at times it is quite apparent that they know little about those for whom they vouch. All the documents used are now uniform in all the courts of this county, and are prepared to meet special classifications; yet these improvements are only the first step in the direction of reform. We believe that, while something may be done by State legislation, the evil is one that should not be left to the various States for correction. We are of the opinion, in fact, that the only solution of the problem is through an act of Congress. The general recommendations made by the Secretary of State in his recent report to the President are eminently sound, and we believe should be enacted into law. Besides these recommendations, too well known to your honorable body to need repetition here, we should respectfully offer for your consideration the following specific suggestions, which we believe should in substance be embodied in a national law:

(1) "No naturalization of any kind, nor applications of intentions to become naturalized, should be permitted after the hour of 5 o'clock

p. m. of any court day. This would prevent the evil of night sessions in large centers of population."

(Evidence of this practice will be found in the naturalization proceedings in the city of Chicago, where, prior to the last election, in November, several of the judges sat until nearly 11 o'clock at night.)

(2) "It should be forbidden by law for anyone or any association, political or otherwise, to pay the expenses of naturalization, and it should be made a misdemeanor, and every applicant for naturalization should be compelled to state, under oath, that he has personally paid the expense connected with the naturalization and has made no arrangement with anyone for a return of the fee.

(3) "In view of the experience that professional witnesses are used, who testify to scores of applications, the law should provide that no one witness shall testify to any naturalization in more than five cases within three months prior to any general or special election, national or State.

"(Great care should be taken in the evidence given by these witnesses and the evidence should be preserved and made a part of the record of the naturalization.)

(4) "No naturalization should be had in any court within thirty days prior to any election, special, general, national, or State, unless in such cases where a right to become naturalized accrues within thirty days, either by the expiration of the five years' residence or by the attainment of the age of majority.

(5) "A return should be made of all naturalization proceedings by the clerks of the several courts to the Secretary of State or to the authorities having naturalization in charge of the General Government, such return to be made within ninety days after each naturalization, the incidental expenses of such return to be paid by the State authorities.

(6) "Legislation should be passed forbidding any court officer from soliciting persons to seek the right of naturalization, and it should be made punishable to do so, the category of court officers to include all sheriffs and bailiffs.

(9) "It should be made a penal offense for any clerk of any court or any officer having naturalization in charge to receive any money from any person or political party as naturalization fees. We do not favor that naturalization should be confined to the Federal courts.

(10) "In all cases of naturalization two witnesses should be required, but it should be left optional with the judge whether in any particular case this requirement be confined to one witness, and in such case the judge should make record of his action in the premises."

In addition, we would suggest that, inasmuch as serious embarrassments, including costly litigation and possible difficulties encountered in foreign lands by those whose certificates of naturalization have been granted by courts without jurisdiction, such as the criminal court of this county, it is a matter for careful consideration whether or not Congress should validate the certificates of citizenship issued through misapprehension of the law.

Respectfully submitted.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. HANSBROUGH submitted an amendment providing for the payment to the Devils Lake Sioux Indians of North Dakota, in addition to any one of installments of $30,000 provided by the act approved April 27, 1904, the sum of $57,874.87, being the amount of the deficit of the $145,000 authorized by said act as the first payment, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. LONG submitted an amendment authorizing the accounting officers of the Treasury Department to reopen and restate accounts of the clerks of the United States district courts for the Indian Territory covering the period from May 31, 1900, to March 3, 1901, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FULTON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2261) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

FAJARDO DEVELOPMENT COMPANY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, and ordered to be printed:

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 4, 1906.

EXISTING STATUS IN SANTO DOMINGO.

Mr. TILLMAN. I send to the desk a resolution, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate, if not incompatible with the public welfare, as to the existing status in Santo Domingo; whether or not President Morales carried his Government with him when he disappeared from the capital or whether he left it behind, and whether the American officers who have been in charge of the custom-houses are still performing that work, and, if so, under what arrangement and by what authority.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SPOONER. I suggest that that resolution involves a very grave question of international law. The Senator will undoubtedly want to speak upon it, and we all want to hear him.

Mr. TILLMAN. No; I do not want to talk upon the resolution. I merely want it passed just as it is.

Mr. SPOONER. Then, I hope the resolution will go over until to-morrow.

Mr. TILLMAN. All right. Under objection, of course, the resolution will go over under the rule. That carries it over until Monday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the resolution will go over.

CONSTRUCTION OF RAILROADS IN THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. CULBERSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate the following:

1. A copy of the invitation to submit bids for the construction of railroads in the Philippine Islands pursuant to the act of Congress now in force.

2. Copies of all bids which were submitted under said invitation.

The Secretary of War is also directed to inform the Senate fully what action has been taken with reference to said bids, giving the reasons for such action, and if all of said bids have been rejected what further action has been taken with reference to the construction of railroads in the Philippine Islands under the law aforesaid.

SURVEY OF COOS BAY, OREGON.

Mr. FULTON submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a survey to be made of Coos Bay and bar, Oregon, with a view to widening and deepening the entrance to said bay to a depth of 40 feet at mean low tide, and to submit a plan and estimate for such improvement.

The Secretary of War is also authorized and directed to cause an investigation to be made as to the present commerce of said Coos Bay and the commercial resources of the country tributary thereto, and report the same to Congress.

That the expense of such survey and investigation be paid out of the unexpended balance of the appropriation heretofore made for the improvement of the entrance to said Coos Bay and Harbor.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] be, and he is hereby, appointed to the following committees: To Investigate the Condition of the Potomac River Front at Washington (chairman); Census; Civil Service and Retrenchment; Claims; Immigration; Indian Affairs, and Pensions.

Mr. GORMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Senator from Oregon [Mr. GEARIN] be, and he is hereby, appointed to the following committees: Claims; Pensions; Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game; Industrial Expositions, and National Banks.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent of the Senate that I be excused from further service upon the Committee on the District of Columbia, and that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. GEARIN] be substituted in my place on that committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] asks unanimous consent of the Senate that he be excused from further service upon the Committee on the District of Columbia, and that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. GEARIN] be appointed to take his place upon that committee. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

PRINTING OF A DOCUMENT.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to have printed as a document an article published in the North American Review of December, 1905, on the Philippine question, the author being the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. I ask unanimous consent that the article may be published as a document. It is brief.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado asks that an article entitled "A Democrat in the Philippines," heretofore published in the North American Review, may be printed as a document.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senator does not ask for the reading of the paper, does he?

Mr. TELLER. No.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The request was simply that the article be printed as a Senate document.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I think most Senators have seen the article; there has been quite a demand for it; and, therefore, I should like to have it published as a document.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I shall not interpose an objection in this case, but I think it is not a good practice to introduce here articles, essays, treatises, political or otherwise, that are written undoubtedly with great skill, backed up with great knowledge and information, and present them to the country as public documents. I wish that Senators would think of this consideration before asking that any particular treatise or paper, which has not been before Congress, and which is not before a committee, but which is simply taken from some good magazine or some good book or some good newspaper, shall be made a Congressional document.

With this suggestion I shall not now in this case, as the question has just come up for the first time this session, interpose any objection, but I shall certainly reserve the right, if this practice becomes too common, to interpose objection. The Senator from Colorado is an old and conservative Senator, and I think he must feel as I do about this matter.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say that I agree with the Senator from Maine, but I think the Senate will bear me out in the statement that I have rarely asked for such publications. The article in question is one carefully written. It is not a political article in any sense, but is an economic article on an economic question. The question is a live one; a question that is coming here to the Senate for discussion. I know a number of people who have asked for the printing of this article; otherwise I should not have asked for its publication.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, if it be not asking too much of the Senator from Colorado, I should be glad to have him state, so far as he can, the substance of the article. I understand from the reading of the caption of the article that it was written by "A Democrat in the Philippines." I do not know whether he was the first Democrat who has ever been to the Philippines, and I do not know just what the purpose of the publication is.

Mr. TELLER. No, Mr. President; I understand quite a number of Democrats went over to the Philippines after the last session under the auspices of the Secretary of War.

Mr. HALE. Did they come back good Democrats. [Laughter.]

Mr. TELLER. They came back; but what their views are, as a rule, I do not know.

Mr. HALE. The Senator does not know whether they have been converted?

Mr. TELLER. No; I do not.

Mr. HALE. That is a matter that should be carefully looked into. [Laughter.]

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, I desire to suggest to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] that I was one of those Democrats who went to the Philippines, and I can enlighten him. I will state that those Democrats were not converted at all; but I will remind the Senator that he should pay a little attention to the Republicans that accompanied the Democrats and see whether or not they were converted. [Laughter.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], that an article from the North American Review, entitled "A Democrat in the Philippines," written by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], be printed as a public document? The Chair hears none, and the order to print is made.

EMPLOYMENT OF MESSENGERS OR ASSISTANT CLERKS FOR COMMITTEES.

Mr. KEAN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate on the 21st day of December passed a resolution giving to the Select Committee on National Banks a messenger.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey moves that the vote by which the resolution referred to by him was passed be reconsidered. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Select Committee on National Banks be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a messenger, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, at the rate of $1,440 per annum, until otherwise provided by law.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey to reconsider the vote by which the resolution just read was passed.

Mr. KEAN. One moment, Mr. President. That resolution was amended on the motion of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL]. Let the amendment be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment referred to will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, after the words "Select Committee on National Banks," I move to add the words, "and all other committees of the Senate not now provided with messengers."

Mr. LODGE. That is right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, if it is not unreasonable, I would venture to ask the Senator from New Jersey to explain briefly the object of his motion.

Mr. KEAN. The object of my motion, Mr. President, is to reconsider the vote by which the resolution which has just been read was adopted, in order that, as I conceive, the true intent of the Senate may be put into the resolution—that is, to amend the resolution by adding after the word "messengers" the words "or assistant clerks," so that each committee of the Senate will be provided with a clerk and an assistant clerk or messenger.

Mr. SPOONER. How would it leave the matter if that vote should be reconsidered and the resolution amended as proposed by the Senator from New Jersey? Would that leave every committee with a clerk and an assistant clerk?

Mr. KEAN. Yes; or a messenger.

Mr. SPOONER. Or a messenger. How many committees would be affected by that? We were told the other day, I remember——

Mr. KEAN. Three or four will be affected by it if we put in the words "or clerk," but if the resolution should be left as it is it would affect twenty-nine committees.

Mr. SPOONER. These are to be, as I understand, active committees.

Mr. KEAN. Yes; active committees.

Mr. SPOONER. If the resolution shall be reconsidered and the Senator's amendment adopted, every committee, large or small, active or inactive, will have a clerk and either an assistant clerk or a messenger?

Mr. KEAN. That is right.

Mr. FORAKER. And nothing more.

Mr. KEAN. Not under this resolution.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask, Mr. President, that the resolution may go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over at the request of the Senator from Ohio, if there be no objection.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask unanimous consent to put to the Senator from New Jersey another question, only for information. Under the resolution as it now stands, will every committee of the Senate have a clerk, an assistant clerk, and a messenger?

Mr. KEAN. No. Some committees have an assistant clerk now. Some of the committees that have assistant clerks claim the right, in addition, to appoint messengers. This is to limit the number to two assistants for each committee that has not already an assistant clerk or messenger. Of course, it will not interfere with the Committee on Appropriations, with the Committee on Pensions, with the Committee on Foreign Relations, or with any of the large committees that have assistant clerks at the present time. A great many of them are provided for by law and not from the contingent fund of the Senate. This applies to those who are paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I objected only because I wanted an opportunity to look at the resolution and see what the effect of it would be. I understand now from the explanation that has been made that the resolution, if adopted, will not interfere with committees that have already clerks and assistant clerks and messengers.

Mr. KEAN. It will not.

Mr. FORAKER. Then I have no objection.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, Mr. President, I interpose an objection and ask that the matter go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the motion does not necessarily go over upon a single objection.

Mr. SPOONER. No.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider is before the Senate, and the question is on agreeing to the motion.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understood that on the objection of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] the matter was going over, and that he has just withdrawn his request that it go over.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; I have withdrawn my objection.

Mr. LODGE. A motion to reconsider does not go over on a single objection, I think.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has so stated.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not know upon what objection—I have not examined the rule—the motion would go over; but I do not desire that it shall be disposed of summarily at this time. There is some information that I should like to have as to what committees have more than a clerk and an assistant clerk.

The Senate acted upon this matter, I thought, with a full knowledge of what it was doing. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] proposed an amendment that committees not having a messenger should each of them be provided with one.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. That was immediately after the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], in answer to a question which I put to him, stated that the resolution affected only two or three committees; but it now turns out to be the fact that twenty-eight or twenty-nine committees are affected. Am I not right?

Mr. KEAN. That is right.

Mr. HEYBURN. But, Mr. President, if twenty-eight or twenty-nine committees are entitled to messengers, they should have them. The proceedings in regard to this matter will be found on page 633 of the RECORD of the last day of the session before the vacation. The Senator from New Jersey said:

> Mr. KEAN. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], to report it favorably, in order to do away with discrimination. I report the resolution without amendment, and ask for its present consideration.
> The resolution was read, as follows:
> "Resolved, That the Select Committee to Investigate Trespassers upon Indian Lands be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a messenger, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, at the rate of $1,440 per annum, until otherwise provided by law."
> Mr. HEYBURN. I understand from the Senator that this covers all the committees that have not messengers.
> Mr. KEAN. I believe it does, with one more that I am about to report. It covers every Senator, I believe, who had no messenger or other patronage.

That is quite general.

> The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho object to the consideration of the resolution?
> Mr. HEYBURN. I do not object to the resolution. I asked the question for information.
> The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.
> Mr. KEAN. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NIXON], to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.
> The resolution was read, and considered by unanimous consent, as follows:
> "Resolved, That the Select Committee on National Banks be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a messenger, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, at the rate of $1,440 per annum, until otherwise provided by law."
> Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, after the words "Select Committee on National Banks," I move to add the words, "and all other committees of the Senate not now provided with messengers."
> Mr. LODGE. That is right.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator allow me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator kindly give me the date of the RECORD from which he reads?

Mr. HEYBURN. Page 633 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, December 21, 1905.

Mr. DANIEL. Thank you.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the question of extending assistance to committees of this body has been somewhat talked about. A very large number of committees of this body are located in the Annex; they are separated from the body of the Senate and from the business of the Senate in a most inconvenient way; and they have not even the accommodation of a desk within this building. Their members have occasion to go backward and forward frequently in the performance of their duties connected with the work of their committees and connected with their work as members of this body; they have no messenger to send, and so they must either take the clerk of their committee or the assistant clerk, or they must appeal to the ordinary messenger service that is connected with the Senate; they have no one who belongs to the committee that they may call upon to perform the duties that arise every hour during the sessions of this body. It is but fair that those committees that are deprived of the ordinary conveniences which are enjoyed by other committees of this body should be provided with messengers to perform those duties; and it would not be such a burden as would seem to be unreasonable upon the expenses of this body.

I was very much gratified when the Senate so unanimously concurred in the amendment of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] in regard to this question. I immediately proceeded to take advantage of it, to nominate a competent man to perform the duties of messenger, and to install him in his duties; but I was advised by the department in which those appointments are filed that a caveat had been entered there that stayed the force and effect of the action of this body as it appears upon the record, and that no such appointment could be recognized, notwithstanding the fact that this body had in its usual manner acted upon the question.

I hope there will be no hasty disposition of this matter. If it is not the intention of this body to provide assistance for at least those committees that are separated in the performance of their duties from the main body, let us know that after fair and full consideration. The proposition has been made, I believe—I will not, however, take up the question now—that these committees might be provided with some conveniences in this Capitol that would avoid the necessity of going backward and forward several blocks in every kind of weather and making a trip of it whenever the little details connected with their business require them to come in contact with their committee rooms or with the clerical force at their disposal. I hope the Senate will seriously consider this matter before it reconsiders and undoes the very good work which it did on the last day of the session before the holidays.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator quoted my name in reading the debate. I merely desire to state the understanding on which I voted for that resolution. What I supposed it covered was that some committees had two clerks and a messenger, or three clerks. There are some that have two, and there are others that have only one. I understood the purpose of the resolution as it was amended on the motion of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] was to give to every chairman of a committee a clerk and an assistant clerk or a messenger—that is, two persons connected with the committee where theretofore there was only one. I did not understand, and I do not think the Senator understood, that the proposition was to give three assistants to every committee. Some committees have three now, as I say, some have two, and some only one. It is not necessary to discuss whether it is desirable to give every committee three clerks. The point is that that is a separate proposition from the one which I think all Senators understood on the last day of the session before the vacation. To add a third clerk or messenger—for most of these messengers do clerical work—would involve an expenditure of $50,000 a year, a very large addition to the roll of the Senate. I am not prepared to say whether that is necessary or not. Some committees have more to do than other committees; they have hearings, they have a great many bills, and that work of the committee takes practically the time of one man. Therefore, on those committees the chairman who has two clerks is no better off really than the chairman of an entirely inactive committee who has two clerks. All I wished to point out was that the proposition which is now made was not the one on which I think Senators thought they were voting the other day. Whether it is a meritorious proposition or not is another thing.

What we meant to do the other day, as I understood, was to provide that every chairman of a committee, whether a majority chairmanship or a minority chairmanship, had at least two clerks, or a messenger and a clerk, the messenger performing clerical work. I think that is very proper. I think they ought all at least to have those two, but whether we want to go further and make the force of every committee, without reference to the work of the committee, three persons, is a much larger proposition.

I hope, therefore, the Senate will reconsider the vote by which the previous resolution was passed, so as to bring the matter fairly before the Senate. I do not think we want to undertake to act under a resolution about which there was certainly complete misunderstanding on the part of many Senators. I do not think we want to establish an expenditure of nearly $50,000, when a great many Senators supposed from the colloquy which occurred here, as I certainly did, that the proposition involved only two or three or three or four additional clerks.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I desire to inquire of the chairman of the committee having this matter in charge how it happens that the salaries paid to the messengers and the salaries paid to the clerks vary from nine hundred dollars to fourteen hundred and forty dollars as to messengers and from fifteen hundred up to two thousand two hundred and twenty for clerks?

Mr. KEAN. Replying to the Senator from Texas, I will say that those figures, I believe, are established by law.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, then it must be a bad law which estimates the value of one Senator's messenger at fourteen hundred and forty dollars and another Senator's messenger at nine hundred dollars.

Speaking for myself, I believe that every Senator ought to be sufficiently provided with clerical help, and I take it no Senator here would hesitate a moment to vote for such a proposition; but to provide a Senator with two clerks and one messenger looks to me like putting them somewhat in the Senator's way. It may be there are here some Senators with so many things requiring their attention that they need three assistants, but as for myself—and I am not inclined to neglect my part of this work—I think a third one would be in my way. I take it that it is largely the same with most of the Senators.

But what I protest against is the disparity. If a clerk is worth $1,500, I want him to be paid $1,500, because I believe that the laborer is worthy of his hire; but if a clerk is worth only $1,500 I do not want him to be paid $2,220, because I believe the hire is also worthy of the laborer; and it seems to me that while this matter is before us now it would be a very good time to equalize the salaries of men who perform practically the same service.

I perfectly understand that the clerks to the important committees of this body are entitled to receive and do receive higher salaries than those who are purely and only clerks to Senators. I presume there are clerks to certain important committees who are well-nigh invaluable to those committees, and I do not grudge a proper and even a liberal salary to such a clerk, a salary commensurate with his capacity and his usefulness; but I do not believe there can be any defense for wasting the public money by paying one clerk $2,220 for what another clerk performs for $1,500, unless the $1,500 clerk is underpaid.

Of course, I understand that the salary of $2,220 is attached to the clerkships of certain committees, but those committees, as we understand, generally have no duties to perform, or at least perform no extra labor. They are rather ornamental than useful positions, though under the rules of the Senate it is well to have them, because occasions come when those committees are required to do important work. But for——

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is quite right that there is a great disparity, in the pay of clerks of committees, between the actual duties and what they perform. But that is not a thing that the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate can deal with. It has all grown up and is a part of the body of the law of the Senate. In the old days only two or three committees, very hard-working committees, had clerks who were paid above $1,500 or $1,800. From time to time, on appropriation bills and otherwise, amendments were adopted putting on other committees, at $1,800 and then at $2,250. So now the great number of committees of the Senate have clerks at $2,250—committees which almost never meet—and other committees that have a great deal of work to do have clerks at the same salary.

Mr. GALLINGER. Twenty-two hundred and twenty dollars.

Mr. HALE. I do not know why that sum was fixed. But the Senator from Texas knows it is pretty difficult to take any back steps. Everything is entirely different from what it used to be, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. BAILEY. And somewhat different from what it ought to be.

Mr. HALE. I think so. I served in the Senate fifteen years and had but one clerk. I had no assistant clerk and no messenger. I did not think I was entitled to an assistant clerk. As the Senator from Texas says, he would have been in the way. I should like to have had a messenger. I had only one clerk. But never until within the last few years did the Committee on Naval Affairs, which does a great deal of work, have an assistant clerk, and it has not a messenger attached to the committee. It has one assigned to it.

That is the way all this has come up. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], who has served with me on the Committee on Appropriations for years, will bear me out that it is a thing fixed in the law, and it is unequal undoubtedly.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, of course the labor to be performed by the Senator himself and therefore the labor to be performed by the clerk or his assistant grows greater every year. The Government is touching the people at so many new places, I regret to say, that the correspondence of a Senator to-day is perhaps five times what it was in the days to which the Senator from Maine refers.

The truth of it is the correspondence of a Senator has become the burden of a Senator's life, and the task of writing thirty or forty and sometimes fifty letters is an almost daily one with us. Writing those letters for a thousand years would not add a cubit to a man's intellectual stature. It is purely a burden, but it is one which must be performed. When a Senator's constituent writes him on any subject, that constituent is entitled to a prompt and a respectful answer, and if the Senator does not allow the constituent to hear from him the Senator is very apt to hear from the constituent at the proper time; and I share the resentment which a constituent feels toward a Senator who ignores his communication.

This correspondence, growing from year to year, has become such a great burden that it would be utterly impossible for a Senator to perform his duties without clerical assistance. As for my part I am willing to give all that is necessary, but I am not willing to spend one dollar of public money to provide patronage for anybody. If the work of a Senator's committee or the work of a Senator requires three, let him have them. But I will not vote one dollar of public money merely to provide somebody a place. Patronage is not a very wholesome thing for a Senator to cultivate, and certainly it is not a very wholesome thing for the Senate to provide places merely that Senators may fill them.

But, Mr. President, that was not the purpose for which I rose. I rose to protest against the inequality which offends against the rule of justice. Either some clerks are paid too much or other clerks are paid too little. My own opinion is that some clerks are paid too much. But if Senators do not agree with me in that, they must agree with me that men who perform the same services should receive the same pay.

I beg to say that I do not mean this in the nature of a complaint against the Senator from New Jersey or the committee over which he presides; I do not mean it as a complaint against any committee or as against the Senate, because I recognize that it has grown up from time to time, as suggested by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], but I do insist that it is an inequality which ought to be corrected.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I am not one of those Senators who are suffering from any incumbrance of patronage, but every Senator has to deal with a great many people who have very mistaken notions as to his power to exercise patronage. I do not think that any Senator here, on either side of the House, wishes to increase the clerical force of the Senate with any view to patronage. It is purely a matter of public business and the prompt dispatch thereof.

I observe in a detailed statement of the clerical and other committee force now employed and paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate that a great many committees have three or four employees, some of them perhaps more. Amongst the committees that have three or more I will enumerate the following: First, the Committee on Printing Records. I do not see the name of a Committee on Printing Records in the list of committees, and I did not know there was one. I presume it refers to the Joint Committee on Printing. Probably it may be otherwise named in this statement. The Committee on Appropriations has four; the Committee on Finance four; the Committee on Claims four; the Committee on Commerce three; the Committee on Pensions five; the Committee on the Judiciary three; the Committee on Military Affairs four; the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads four; the Committee on the District of Columbia three; the Committee on Foreign Relations three; the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry three; the Committee on Territories three; the Committee on Interstate Commerce three; the Committee on Privileges and Elections three; the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico three; the Committee on the Philippines three; the Committee on Immigration three.

Mr. President, I am chairman of a very modest committee and which has a very modest establishment in what is sometimes called the "catacombs." I have no right to complain in any respect. It is the best the situation admits of. In addition to that, those committees which have as many as three employees having already been stated, there was a motion to give the Committee on National Banks a messenger. The Committee on National Banks is not one of the great committees of the Senate, like Appropriations or Finance, and it seemed that if we were going to give a messenger to a committee which had a single topic of treatment, and that a minor one as compared to the great and constant affairs of Government, other committees of like order ought to have them.

Now, in respect to committee chairmanships held by minority members, this observation seems appropriate: Few of those committees have much business. For the most part they have little or no business. The committee of which I am chairman has at present no business of general public concern. The committee rooms are used by the Senators as offices, especially the small committees. They are indispensable to the conduct of their public business. The committees vary as to their business. A particular incident happens in our Government by which a committee is overwhelmed for the time being with business and then, after a freshet, again there is a drought. You can not in the nature of things tell when a particular committee is going to have much business. Our Committee on Privileges and Elections, for instance, has had very heavy business and many hearings for a year or two. The time will soon come perhaps when they will not have a case or any matter of importance referred to them. We can not measure the necessities of a committee by the particular business which may be upon them at a particular moment.

I had presumed, and I believe such is the case, that the minority Senators were allowed this service because of their multifarious connections with the Government, rather than in the view that they would need these appurtenances and this aid for mere committee work.

Mr. President, I am told by the chairman of the committee which reported this resolution, and doubtless it is true, that in addition to these employees who are paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate the Senators who at this time represent the majority of the Senate have numerous other employees who assist in their work. There is no impropriety whatsoever in that if it is indispensable or appropriate to their efficient work.

The view I have of this question is simply this: It is to the interest of the Senate as a body that every Senator should be sustained by such appropriate help as is desirable for his efficient discharge of his Senatorial duties. A day may come at any time when his committee will have a good deal of work, although at that particular day it has none. Whether that day comes or not, his office in the Capitol, or as near thereto as accommodations will permit, has to be attended by his clerical force and by those who are ready to wait upon him and to help him in the execution of his office.

The Senate, Mr. President, like every other department of our Government, is congested. Our Calendars are congested with bills. There is not a bureau of the Government that is not congested. We must remember that we have added an empire to this Republic, call it by whatever name you will; and I am not adverting to it for the purpose of the slightest censorious observation. We have to take things as we find them. But the truth is that the American Republic at home is a republic, and the truth is also that from the far Orient to out in the Atlantic it is an empire. The men who are elected here as Senators of the United States are the legislators of a great empire, as well as of a republic, whether they will or no. That has come about in the destiny of this nation, and I am not discussing it at all save to call attention to the fact. We had brought up before the Senate this morning railroads in the Philippine Islands, 7,000 miles from where we are. What Senator knows anything about the subject, and how is he to inform himself? In order to the efficient discharge of the Senatorial duty here, the Senator ought to be sustained and have every employee in his service who is necessary or desirable to write his correspondence, to visit the Departments, and to meet those who wish to see him on public business.

I have no hesitation in spending a dollar of the people's money for the purpose of enabling me to discharge my office in a conscientious manner. I appreciate the courtesy of the Senate in according facilities to the minority members, but I believe, sir, that it rests upon a much higher view of the situation than courtesy. We call it courtesy because it is a fitting and appropriate exercise of Senatorial power. The Senators who are in the minority are just as responsible in their own conscience, are just as responsible to their constituents for the administration of this Government as are those who chance for the time being to be in the majority, and in some respects they have a heavier laboring oar than have those of the majority.

Now, then, this is a fitting time, at the beginning of a long session of a new Congress, to fix this matter and to fix it right, and let us fix it understandingly. Let us know what are the conveniences and what are the attendants of the various committees, and let us accord them according to the proprieties of each particular case and according to the reasonable necessities of Senatorial duty. I do not consider for myself that the three employees are a bit too many to enable me properly to discharge my duties. I do not want them for patronage. Patronage never has been and never will be a source of power to a man who is here to do his duty and for no other purpose. Patronage has oftener been the downfall of men than it has been their upbuilding. I do not seek patronage. I wish I did not have the little I possess. It is an incumbrance to Senators rather than an aid to them in their political career, if their political career is designed to be for the public good and not for some ulterior and sinister purpose. But the little patronage that does come to us and which is accorded in order to enable us to discharge our duties ought to be freely and fully accorded, and the honor of a Senator ought to be sufficient to give him any help which he would state in the open Senate he felt was desirable for the efficient discharge of his Senatorial duties.

My honorable friend the Senator who desires to have a messenger to attend him at the Maltby House ought to have that messenger, and any other Senator here who wants a messenger and signifies his desire to have him in service ought to have him.

Men who are Senators of the United States and who are responsible to this country and to the States to do their duty, to answer the letters of their constituents and to attend the multifarious questions that come before them, should be sustained by the Government of the United States in no stinted way, and in no other way than that which reason and common sense and the measure of means to end may dictate.

I offered the amendment in a somewhat different understanding of this case from that which I discover was in the mind of the chairman. Here are many committees of the Senate, some of them not now having much business before them, that have only two employees. There is no reason why those committees should not have three as well as the Committee on National Banks. There is no annual business about the Committee on National Banks.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator from Virginia excuse me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I simply want to clear up my understanding of the proposition. I did not understand that the proposition was to give the Committee on National Banks three employees, but only two.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. KEAN. That is the proposition.

Mr. DANIEL. Perhaps that is true.

Mr. LODGE. That is, the Committee on National Banks, on which this started, has one clerk.

Mr. DANIEL. Ah!

Mr. LODGE. The proposition was to give it a messenger, who was to act as clerk, making two employees.

Mr. DANIEL. The intention was to give the committee two?

Mr. LODGE. The intention was to give them two; and then I understood the Senator's amendment was to make it uniform, and to give two to each committee.

Mr. DANIEL. I thought that that committee had two already.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, no.

Mr. LODGE. No; and there are two or three other committees that do not have two employees, the Senator from New Jersey says.

Mr. DANIEL. I observe by the list that they all appear to have two. Possibly I may be mistaken.

Mr. KEAN. I think the Senator will find that the Committee on Rules has only one.

Mr. DANIEL. Only one?

Mr. KEAN. The Committee on Rules, over which the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] presides, has only one.

Mr. DANIEL. I was also informed, however, by the chairman of the Committee on Contingent Expenses that those Senators who had only two employees that were paid out of the contingent fund had more who were paid by law, so that this would be a misleading list if we were to take it as an indication of the number of employees of committees; and unless the mind reverted to the fact——

Mr. KEAN. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. KEAN. I think the Senator must have misunderstood me. I did not mean to say they are employees of the committee. They are employees of the Senate, and often employees of the Senate, who have been recommended by Senators and so on, do work for Senators.

Mr DANIEL. They are assigned to the work of Senators?

Mr. KEAN. I do not even think that.

Mr. DANIEL. I should like to get the correct statement of it.

Mr. KEAN. At least they are employed by the Senate, and during hours when the Senate is not in session I think they often work for Senators; but I do not think they are assigned to the committees.

Mr. DANIEL. I misapprehended the Senator.

Mr. KEAN. All the assignments to committees are, I think, in the book the Senator has. The others are simply employees of the Senate.

Mr. DANIEL. I understand the Senator now. As I understand the Senator, the majority have a certain control of the patronage of the Senate and when gentlemen who hold positions under that patronage are not employed in the public business of the Senate they are enabled to assist them, very properly, in their own Senatorial work.

Now, Mr. President, here is the point I make as to that. In the discharge of Senatorial work every minority member ought to stand as the peer of his associate in the majority; and as he has not got such patronage, he should have that help from the Government which will enable him just as fully to discharge his duties as a Senator as those who are on the majority side of the Chamber.

A mere glance at this list of those who are paid out of the contingent fund would not reveal the actual state of affairs which we have to deal with. I do not consider it unreasonable that any committee should have three employees, provided the Senator who is chairman of that committee has no patronage which he can draw upon for the help which is necessary for the discharge in a proper way of the Senatorial office.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. KEAN. Now I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Virginia by inserting after the word "messengers" the words "or assistant clerks."

Mr. GALLINGER. So as to read?

Mr. LODGE. So that it will read?

Mr. KEAN. Let the resolution be read as I propose to amend it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey moves to amend the resolution. The Secretary will read the resolution as it would stand if amended.

The Secretary proceeded to read the resolution as proposed to be amended.

Mr. KEAN. That does not read right.

Mr. LODGE. That is wrong. It is not right.

Mr. SPOONER. Is there any objection to this matter going over until the Senate meets again?

Mr. KEAN. If it were not for those who are on the rolls already, the two or three who have been appointed, I should not object.

Mr. LODGE. Five have been appointed.

Mr. KEAN. Five have been appointed, and I do not care to strike them from the rolls of the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. I suggest that the Senator from New Jersey propose the amendment that he wishes to have come in and have it read.

Mr. LODGE. He has done so.

Mr. FORAKER. Now it can be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution with the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Select Committee on National Banks, and all other committees of the Senate not now provided with messengers or assistant clerks, be, and are hereby, authorized to employ messengers, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, at the rate of $1,440 per annum, until otherwise provided by law.

Mr. LODGE. I suggest that the Senator from New Jersey read the resolution as amended.

Mr. KEAN (reading)—

Resolved, That the Select Committee on National Banks be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a messenger, and all other committees of the Senate not now provided with messengers or assistant clerks be, and are hereby, authorized to employ messengers, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, at the rate of $1,440 per annum, until otherwise provided by law.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I did not have in view the question of patronage when I addressed the Senate at the beginning of this discussion. I have not considered the question of patronage at all. I do not regard this as a question involving that principle. It was merely that a Senator might be provided with sufficient clerical help to perform his duties as a Senator. There is no use in evading the situation. While these are assistants to the committees, they are in effect assistants to the Senators who are chairmen of the committees, and it amounts to a question as to how much assistance each Senator shall have. Shall he have enough to enable him to perform the duties that devolve upon him as a Senator?

I may say personally that I have been compelled to employ extra help at my own expense, and I am doing it now in the performance of my duty as a Senator. For any duties that may arise other than those connected with my official position of course I expect to provide the necessary clerical force.

But the question is, Shall we, by this resolution, as it was adopted the other day, provide all Senators with sufficient clerical force? It has been stated here that it would be desirable could each Senator be rid of what has been termed the incumbrance of correspondence incident to his position. I do not think that that is just the right spirit in which to regard this question. We are here to represent the people, and they are entitled to correspond with us, and they are entitled to be answered. For one I like to see the people come close enough to the Government and be interested enough in the performance of their duties as citizens and our duties as their representatives to communicate with us. They are entitled to it, and I do not begrudge it at all. I am perfectly willing to answer every letter that comes and to perform all of the little duties in the way of accommodation that are incident to the holding of the position.

I hope this question will not be disposed of at this time. There is only a very meager attendance of the Senate here, and when we meet again there will undoubtedly be a fuller attendance. It is a question which affects a great many Senators who are not here at this time. I hope the resolution will go over by general consent until they are here, and not foreclose the Senators who are not here in disposing of this resolution.

Leaving out any question of patronage, or sentiment connected with the question of patronage, and looking at it merely as a question of necessity to enable us to perform our duties, no man holding the position of a Senator should be forced ever to neglect his public duty or else to pay for the assistance necessary to perform it out of his own pocket.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, assuming all that has been stated by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], I still submit, from the remarks which have been made here on the floor, that the proper course is to go back to the old method of considering each one of the committees separately. It has been suggested by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] that the committee probably would not know what to do with a third man. Hence I do not see any necessity for forcing upon any committees something that is absolutely unnecessary. If we go back to the system which we have had heretofore, the Senator can present to the proper committee his statement that he needs other help. I believe on the mere statement of any Senator that the work of his committee is such that he is either compelled to employ the extra service himself or else secure other assistance the proper committee—the Committee on Contingent Expenses—would immediately authorize him to secure that extra assistance. It seems to me that that is the proper and the only just way to deal with the question.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from North Dakota to the fact that the measure of the needs of a Senator is not the committee which he may be at the head of. The measure of the needs of a Senator is other than the needs of a committee, and the measure of the needs of a Senator is not the same in the case of each Senator. Some Senators represent constituencies ten times as large as other Senators and have ten times as much work devolved upon them of the nature indicated by the Senator from Idaho. So it seems to me in dealing with this question we ought to take a much broader view of it than that which is limited by the needs of a particular committee of which a Senator may happen to be the head.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator understood me correctly, he would find that we are not at all in disagreement upon that proposition. Each Senator does his work mostly through certain committees. I did not have reference merely to the chairman of that committee, but to the work of the Senator upon the several committees. If the work is such that he needs that extra assistance, I am certain that the Committee on Contingent Expenses would report favorably a resolution authorizing the extra assistance, whether he was chairman or otherwise.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Idaho. The resolution as now proposed to be amended by the chairman of the Committee on Contingent Expenses is, I think, eminently just and proper, and it would furnish relief to a great many Senators who are loaded with a great deal of work. It would give them either an assistant clerk or a messenger. Whatever name he would be called by, he would undoubtedly perform the functions of an assistant clerk.

Now, if it turns out that the Senator from Idaho needs, in addition to that, a messenger for his committee, let that be included as a separate proposition and refer it to the committee. If he is entitled to it, he can get it; but the Senator, I suggest, in all fairness, ought not to stand in the way of others getting a little additional help in some nineteen or twenty committees. I trust the Senator will withdraw his objection on that account.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am not urging an objection so much as placing myself in the light in which I desire to stand on this question. It was suggested that this was an attempt to get patronage, and I desire to disclaim that principle. I agree with the Senator from Minnesota that it does not affect me personally at all. I am very glad to have this resolution adopted, and I want it adopted in such a way and after such consideration as will leave me standing in a proper light, or the light in which I desire to present myself in this discussion.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. I beg leave to say to the Senator——

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 529) to promote the national defense, to create a force of naval volunteers, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will take occasion to say that it was my purpose to address the Senate as briefly as might be on this bill to-day, but there are reasons why I prefer to postpone that service until Monday next. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for the purpose of concluding the discussion which is now in progress.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EMPLOYMENT OF MESSENGERS OR ASSISTANT CLERKS FOR COMMITTEES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN]. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] yielded to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL].

Mr. DANIEL. I beg to say to the Senator I do not think anyone suggested that this was a mere patronage. I think he misapprehended an observation which the Senator from Texas made.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was not referring to the remarks of the Senator from Virginia at all.

Mr. DANIEL. I simply arose because I thought the Senator from Idaho misapprehended an observation made by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Virginia evidently misunderstood an observation of the Senator from Texas. The question of patronage did not originate with me. I took it from some one on the other side of the Chamber, who claimed an appointment as a matter of patronage, as I understood.

Mr. DANIEL. I only wished to put the Senator from Idaho right about it. I was simply affirming that the Senator from Texas had made no such suggestion.

Mr. BAILEY. I think the stenographer's notes will show that some Senator on the other side first referred to this as a matter of patronage.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I do not desire, so far as I am concerned, to prolong this discussion nor to oppose or to urge any further opposition to the adoption of the resolution, because it does leave the field open for further consideration along the line suggested by both the Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from North Dakota. Any committee desiring further assistance of course may have it by conforming to the usual manner of proceeding.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a single word.

The first two years I had service in this body I had the honor of being chairman of the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, a committee that did not hold a meeting during those two years and has not held a meeting since. The committee had a clerk, I think at $1,500, and we got along very comfortably. I was promoted from that position to that of chairman of the Committee on Pensions, and I need not more than suggest to the Senate that more service was required there of a clerical nature than was required for the committee I had formerly served as chairman. From that committee I was either promoted or demoted, I do not know which, to the chairmanship of the Committee on the District of Columbia. That committee is trying to legislate for about 300,000 people who are denied the right of suffrage, and I think it is safe to say that at least 200,000 of them are constitutional kickers. We have a procession in that committee room constantly. We have to deal with sewers, with lamp-posts, with electric lights, street railways, steam railways, telephones, telegraphs, gas, and almost every other conceivable subject. That committee has one clerk, an assistant clerk, and a messenger. It ought really to have more clerical assistance, but we manage by hard work to get along.

The proposition embodied in the resolution which was adopted a few days ago, and which I did not understand fully, was to give the Committee on Woman Suffrage, as an illustration, the Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics, the Committee on Standards, Weights, and Measures, the Committee on National Banks, and the Committee to Investigate Trespassers upon Indian Lands——

Mr. KEAN. The Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics no longer exists.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from New Jersey says the Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics no longer exists. If necessary, it will be revived. The proposition was to give those committees two clerks and a messenger, precisely the number that the Committee on the District of Columbia has.

Now, Mr. President, it would not be fair to have an adjustment of that kind made, and I submit to the Senate, without desiring to make any further suggestion about my own committee, that if each of these minor committees gets a clerk and an assistant clerk or a clerk and a messenger it will be a very liberal disposition, and we ought all to be satisfied with it. I am very glad to know that the Senator from Idaho, after thinking the matter over, has concluded that it is a proper thing for us to adopt the resolution as amended.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I desire to say simply one word in order that what has just been said by the Senator from New Hampshire may not be misunderstood, either here or by the public, in regard to the clerks of committees that do no work.

We all know the fact that there are committees, some of which have been mentioned by him, which are merely nominal committees. But it is a mistake, Mr. President, to have the impression that the clerk of that committee has no duty to perform by reason of the fact that the committee itself does no work. The fact is that every Senator, whether he is chairman of a committee or not, has a secretary, and when a Senator is chairman of a committee he has not a secretary in addition to the clerk of the committee. His own secretary becomes ex officio clerk of that committee, or, vice versa, the clerk of that committee is ex officio his clerk or secretary.

So, when it is said that the clerk of the committee is the officer of a committee which is never called together, it will certainly produce a very wrong impression if it is understood from that that the clerk of that committee has absolutely no duties to perform. He has just the same duties that the clerk or secretary of every other Senator has in the performance of the clerical duty required by that Senator, and the only effect of being the clerk of one of these nominal committees is that he gets a little more salary than he would get if he were not named as the clerk of a committee. He is in fact in such a case but the private secretary of the Senator and in no manner differs from any other private secretary of a Senator except in the fact that he gets an additional amount of salary.

The Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] asks me about the assistant clerk. It is true also in that case that the clerk of a committee, who is ex officio the clerk or secretary of a Senator, and the assistant clerk are both of them in such cases simply employed in the work of the Senator.

I may speak for myself as the chairman of one of the so-called nominal committees (Woman Suffrage), having only occasionally some very interesting audiences from a very interesting and charming portion of the public. Outside of that particular duty which devolves upon the clerk of the committee and the assistant, who is detailed from the Sergeant-at-Arms' office, the official work which those two officers have to do, in addition to the committee work, is more than can be reasonably required of them without other clerical assistance. As stated by the Senator from Idaho, ever since I have been a member of this body, with rare exceptions, it has been necessary for me to have additional clerical force to that which is supplied to me by the Senate. To all, except those of us who have had experience in this matter, it is difficult to realize the vast amount of office clerical work and departmental work devolving upon even those of us who belong to the minority, and how utterly impossible it is for any one man as the clerk of a Senator to do the clerical work of that Senator. Two are required for every Senator, and I believe for an average of the Senators more than two are necessary to properly discharge the duties.

A Senator represents the constituency of a whole State. My State, Mr. President, is not the largest by any means. It occupies about the same relation to the other States now that it did when the Government was formed. It is about the thirteenth State. It was one of the original thirteen and the smallest of the original thirteen in population, unless Delaware or Rhode Island. I do not know what their population was at that time. It was the youngest of the colonies. My State at the time of the adoption of the Constitution was the youngest colony which became a State. It was the thirteenth in its relation to the other States. It is still about the thirteenth.

Yet, Mr. President, there are in Georgia two million and a half of people and it is the usual thing when a man in my State has any business of particular importance in Washington about which he writes to his Representative that he also writes to one of the Senators and most frequently to both of them. This involves not only the correspondence, but the work to which that correspondence relates. I presume the same is true of all other Senators.

Now, Mr. President, considering for a moment Georgia as an average, if you please, what must be the immense mass of business which devolves upon a Senator, even if you confine it to the routine business, with a vast constituency behind it, with even a fraction of 1 per cent of them having something to attend to in Washington?

Mr. President, I do not think it becomes this Government (and I know I speak not only my sentiment but the sentiment of the public at large) that one of its officials shall be required to go down into his own pocket to pay for the clerical help which should be paid for by the Government.

I do not know what the status of this resolution is. I unfortunately reached the city on a delayed train and was not here when the discussion opened. I do not propose in anything I say to impede the course of such procedure as those who have been here all the time and have participated from the beginning in this debate see proper or best to be done. But I thought it was proper that I should say this in connection with what had been said by the Senator from New Hampshire, and also, in addition, to say what I have said in justification of what may seem from this debate, or from certain things which others have said in this debate, to be extravagance on the part of the Senate in the provision it makes for the clerical force assisting a Senator in the discharge of his labors.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I quite concur with what the Senator from Georgia has said, and I had no intention to make it appear in the brief observations I made that a clerk to a committee had not service to perform as private secretary to the chairman of the committee. But there is another side to that question, Mr. President. The clerk of the Committee on the District of Columbia has probably not written ten letters for the chairman during the last five years, and he is constantly employed in the work of the committee.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will pardon me. I might have stated at the time, and if the Senator will permit me I will say now, that for such a committee as that there ought to be distinctively a clerk of the committee who shall have no duties except to do the clerical work for the committee, because there are a number of committees in the Senate whose clerical work fully occupies not only one, but two clerks.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is precisely the situation that clerk is in. He is working early and late in the service of the committee, and he performs no service whatever for the chairman.

Now, Mr. President, I do not want to prolong this debate. I think that the Senate is ready to vote on the question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN].

Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, December 21, 1905, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

H. R. 480. An act supplemental to an act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans," approved June 28, 1902, and making appropriation for isthmian canal construction, and for other purposes.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege, and ask that the article which I send forward be read at the desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee rises to a question of privilege and sends an article to the Clerk's desk to be read. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

ABOLISH THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE?

We quite agree that something ought to be done for the relief of the Post-Office Department. Its work is simply tremendous, and, by an interesting coincidence, its usefulness is quite as great. There is no section of the governmental machinery more important or more accurately and satisfactorily conducted. But the burden put upon Mr. Cortelyou and his coadjutors can be materially lightened without impairing its efficiency. It is our opinion, indeed, that the people and the Government both would be better off if the franking privilege were abolished utterly.

That this privilege has been outrageously abused is a fact of universal knowledge. Congressmen load the postal cars with all sorts of freight—furniture, libraries, kitchen utensils, the family wash, pianos, poultry, barnyard animals, etc., without limit. They frank a cow, a washtub, or a churn as glibly as they do a letter or the speech that no one ever heard. They go further—they lend their franks in large, uncounted bunches to societies and propagandas that would flourish on the public Treasury as they already thrive upon the people's discontent. The whole system has been converted to the most abominable ends. It presents the perfected spectacle of graft. But its worst expression is to be found in the lumbering up of the mail cars, the preposterous demands upon the Department's resources of transportation, and the corresponding and concurrent crippling of the postal service in all its proper and legitimate activities.

We note the presentation of an alternative arrangement—an arrangement under the operation of which Members of Congress will receive a direct allowance for the purpose of conducting their official correspondence without cost to themselves. The expedient is most commendable. We quite agree that Members of Congress, who are but ill-paid public servants, should be spared the constant drain upon their resources involved in postage and the like. They should at least be left entirely free of artificial taxes and protected in the complete enjoyment of what small emolument has been assigned them. But this franking concession, which has grown to the proportions of insolent and predaceous graft, this should be contracted within the limits of common decency and transformed into an explicit allowance, no matter how generous and liberal it may be.

We think there are very few Congressmen who would care to oppose this adjustment in full view of the public gaze. Why not try it, gentlemen?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair hardly thinks that the article presents a question of personal privilege.

Mr. SIMS. I did not rise, Mr. Speaker, to a question of personal privilege, but to a question of privilege affecting the membership of the House.

The SPEAKER. Well, it occurs to the Chair that if it is a question affecting the House, a resolution ought to accompany the presentation of the article. However, the gentleman may proceed. Does the gentleman ask unanimous consent to make a statement?

Mr. SIMS. That will do me just as well.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to make a statement. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, the article just read is an editorial clipped by myself from the Washington Post, a newspaper published in this city. The Washington Post does not have the reputation of being a "yellow journal" or a sensational paper. I have never read anywhere any charge in any kind of yellow journal that was more sensational than this. If the statements there alleged to be facts are true, it is a disgrace to this House, at least a disgrace to the Members who have been guilty of the charge. Franking cows, barnyard animals, pianos, libraries, cooking utensils, and so forth. The statement is either true or false. If it is true, it is, as this paper states, the rankest kind of graft. If it is false, it ought to be shown to be false by an investigation, and I for one will introduce a resolution——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman really think that a suggestion of that kind is worthy of the dignity of a denial?

Mr. SIMS. It seems, Mr. Speaker, that the statement on its face ought to carry its own refutation, but if that statement, alleged to be a fact, in the editorial columns of a paper that is quoted all over the country more than any other paper goes without notice, it is taken by the country press and the people as in the nature of a confession.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman believe that Congress ought to investigate every statement in the editorials of the Post which are not true, and yet which reflect upon Congress? [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. The mere conclusion or opinion of a Member affecting legislation is one thing, but this is a statement that Members are guilty, and if they are they ought to be expelled.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman seems to assume that this is a statement of fact. I think the Washington Post intended this only as a matter of vivid imagination and fancy, and never intended it to be taken seriously either by the people of the country or by gentlemen of the House.

Mr. SIMS. It does not state that it is charged. It says it is a fact that Members frank farm animals, kitchen utensils, etc., as freely as they do a letter or the speech no one ever delivered on the floor of the House. There might have been a little humor in the latter part; the other is a specific charge, and the paper ought to make that statement good or withdraw it.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. Does not the gentleman think the charge extravagant and ridiculous that the Post-Office Department, which has charge of the mails of this country, would permit anything of that kind, and does he think it worth taking up a great deal of the time of the House to discussing or denying it?

Mr. SIMS. I will ask if the gentleman from New York will state to me whether or not the statement is in substance true or untrue?

Mr. PAYNE. Why, the gentleman from New York has no idea that any Member of the House ever sent furniture through the mails, or could do so if he tried. I do not believe that one in a million of the readers of that article would believe any such extravagant story as this is about the membership of this House.

Mr. SIMS. Well, it won't do any harm, and it will cost very little to have this matter investigated; at least, we should ask a report from the Postmaster-General as to what abuses, if any, have existed.

Mr. PAYNE. Has the gentleman any resolution to offer now?

Mr. SIMS. Not at this moment, Mr. Speaker. I did not know but what the floor leader of the House on the other side could give me all the information I needed on this subject. I do not think a serious statement set forth in an editorial in a paper of high standing, which if true will blacken and disgrace the Members of this House, ought to remain as a blanket charge on every Member of the House. The charge ought to be investigated and its truth or falsity established.

Mr. PAYNE. Suppose the gentleman introduces such a resolution, if he thinks it should take that course.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I have no resolution ready at this moment to introduce, but if the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and other Members of the House think that I am unnecessarily taking up the time of the House, I shall desist; but I certainly will introduce a resolution to that effect if I can have the time allowed me to write it. I do think that this is of such importance and comes from such a source that it ought not to be passed unnoticed. If any Member of this House is guilty, or if the postal authorities who are charged with the transmission of the mails are taking cattle and libraries and kitchen utensils for Members of Congress and franking them through the mails, they should be discharged from the public service. Mr. Speaker, it appears that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] seems to think that I am taking up valuable time of the House unnecessarily and unprofitably.

Mr. MANN. But, Mr. Speaker, nobody says that.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman that he introduce his resolution in the usual way.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand that the gentleman from Tennessee does not desire to introduce a resolution at this time?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the suggestion is that it be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and then it may be introduced in the usual way.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Tennessee has not yet introduced any resolution. I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee if he will yield for a second?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman understand from an examination of the law what the law provides in reference to the franking privilege?

Mr. SIMS. Well, I certainly understand that it does not go to the extent of including farm animals, kitchen utensils, and libraries. Mr. Speaker, in order to put this thing in proper form, I send the following resolution to the desk and ask that it be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution which the gentleman from Tennessee sends to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads be, and hereby is, instructed to investigate whether or not there are or have been abuses of the franking privilege by Members of Congress or in the name of Members of Congress.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of that resolution.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, Mr. Speaker, I would have to object to unanimous consent for the present consideration of such a resolution as that just read. I do not want to dignify this thing by an investigation. We can get at the facts from the Postmaster-General if an appropriate resolution is introduced.

Mr. SIMS. Then, Mr. Speaker, I shall call up the resolution as a privileged matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the House that the resolution is privileged. The Chair will read from the Digest:

In presenting a question of personal privilege a Member is not required in the first instance to make a motion or offer a resolution; but such is not the rule in presenting a case involving the privileges of the House.

Now, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] has had read an editorial, as he states, and having had read the editorial it seems to the Chair to involve the privileges of the House. He now sends up the resolution which has just been reported. In the opinion of the Chair, the privileges of the House are involved.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, if no one wishes to discuss the resolution I am ready for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SIMS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve the itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House resolution No. 42.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House resolution 42.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House resolution No. 42, with Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania in the chair.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the resolution for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That so much of the annual message of the President of the United States to the two Houses of Congress at the present session as relates to the revenue and the bonded debt of the United States be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I was instructed by the committee at this point—and I make the pro forma amendment—to offer an amendment, adding the words "and insurance," to the matters referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. That matter was discussed at some length before the recess. I think the House came to a pretty clear understanding of what our constitutional rights and limits were with reference to the question of insurance. I desire to say that the amendment was not mine, but was offered at the instance of the committee. It was not in the original text. I desire to state that I do not desire to offer that amendment at this time. I understand also that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] will not offer any amendment giving jurisdiction of this part of the message to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, but it seems to be the consensus of opinion in the House that this matter should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary to report its opinion as to the constitutional rights of the House in the premises. Therefore, I will withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, when the proper time arrives, I wish to offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer the amendment to this paragraph?

Mr. HEPBURN. No, sir.

The Clerk read as follows:

That so much of the President's message as relates to corporations be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report fully at an early day their views as to the power of the Federal Government by legislation to regulate or control said corporations in the management or control of their business and business matters, and if said power exists then the extent of such power and under what provisions of the Constitution it is conferred upon the Congress.

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say I have no objection to that amendment, but favor it when the proper time has arrived, which will be at the end of line 15, page 1.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Are you offering that amendment for present consideration, or did you say you are going to offer it after a while?

Mr. HEPBURN. I will offer it when we reach line 15.

The Clerk read as follows:

That so much as relates to the appropriations of the public revenue for support of the Government as herein provided, namely, for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses, for sundry civil expenses, for fortifications and coast defenses, for pensions, for the District of Columbia, and for all deficiencies, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

That so much as relates to the judiciary of the United States, to the administration of justice, to the punishment and prevention of crime and the organization of courts be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HEPBURN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by inserting that amendment after the word "courts;" I think it would come in there.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves to amend by inserting the amendment, which the Clerk will again report.

Mr. HEPBURN. The Clerk will adjust the amendment to the language.

The Clerk read as follows:

That so much of the President's message as relates to corporations be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report fully at an early day their views as to the power of the Federal Government by legislation to regulate or control said corporations in the management or control of their business and business matters, and if said power exists then the extent of such power and under what provisions of the Constitution it is conferred upon the Congress.

Mr. HEPBURN. Probably it had better come in at the end of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Right after line 15, the Chair understands.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEPBURN. I do.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There has been so much disturbance in the House that nobody except somebody who is sitting close to the gentleman from Iowa knows what this is, and if it is not asking too much I wish he would explain the amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, it is simply a proposition to refer not simply matters of insurance, but all of that portion of the President's message in which he discusses corporations and the power of the Government over them—the whole subject—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That includes insurance?

Mr. HEPBURN. That includes insurance, but it does not include railroads.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does that also include express corporations—interstate express business of the United States?

Mr. HEPBURN. I would rather think not, but I am not sure; but it was that subject that the President discussed relating to the great corporations of the country and the need of some other control than that now exercised by the States. The purpose that I had in view was to get the views of the Judiciary Committee upon those subjects, whether or not the Government of the United States has the power to control those corporations engaging in business between the States or in business with some other State than the State of their creation, and if it have that power the extent of it and the clauses of the Constitution under which the Congress has derived the power to legislate.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will ask the gentleman if he does not think it is of almost as much importance to control the express companies of this country as the railroads of this country?

Mr. HEPBURN. I would suppose when the subject is discussed that is referred to by this legislation, clearly that particular matter that the gentleman has in his mind he will find is also amply discussed. I do not know how I would separate an express company from some other of the great corporations that in my judgment are doing an interstate or a foreign commerce business.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I am glad to know that the gentleman has that view of it, because I think the express companies should be regulated in the same manner as the railroad companies are regulated.

Mr. HEPBURN. I am not at all sure, and I do not wish to commit myself to any proposition of that kind. It was not the purpose of this resolution to especially designate any particular corporation; but the whole subject, as broad as it is, discussed in the message of the President is referred to this committee.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will frankly admit I desired to draw the gentleman out on this very question as to whether or not express companies are to be regulated.

Mr. HEPBURN. If the gentleman has that information, he is gratified.

Mr. NORRIS. I could not hear, even in the reply that the gentleman from Iowa made to the gentleman from Texas, just what he said in regard to this amendment, and I did not hear it clearly when the Clerk read it. The other day when we were discussing the matter I gave notice that at this time I would offer an amendment that would refer the subject of insurance to the Judiciary Committee, and add a provision that the Judiciary Committee be instructed to report what jurisdiction Congress had, if any, over insurance, under our Constitution. Now, if that is included in the gentleman's amendment—if that will be accomplished—I have no desire to offer my amendment, and will heartily favor his. But I could not get the idea from the reading whether it would include that or not.

Mr. HEPBURN. I think that is included.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, Mr. Chairman, in order that there may be no doubt, I wish the Chair would ask the Clerk to read the amendment again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the amendment again.

The amendment was read.

Mr. DALZELL. Does that include other than railroads?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa whether it should not be modified by adding "other than railroads" after "corporations."

Mr. HEPBURN. I had so written it, but in copying it I think that has been omitted, namely, the words "corporations other than railroads."

Mr. DALZELL. Other than railroads?

Mr. HEPBURN. Other than railroads.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be modified to the extent suggested by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. CANDLER. At what point in the resolution is this amendment offered?

The CHAIRMAN. After line 15 on the first page.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] as modified by the unanimous consent of the committee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

That so much as relates to the islands which came to the United States through the treaty of 1899 with Spain, and to Cuba (except so much as relates to the revenue and the appropriations), be referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I am directed by the committee to strike out the words "and to Cuba," in line 13, leaving it preferably where it belongs now, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

That so much as relates to the election of the President, Vice-President, or Representatives in Congress be referred to the Committee on Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 11, page 4, insert "That so much as relates to the irrigation of arid lands be referred to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the resolution as amended to the House, with recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration House resolution 42, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the resolution as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote asked upon any of the amendments? If not, they will be voted upon in gross.

No separate vote was demanded.

The amendments were agreed to in gross; and the resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PAYNE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask consideration at this time of a resolution to print for the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for consideration of the following resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized to have printed and bound whatever papers and documents in connection with subjects under consideration by the committee may be necessary to the transaction of its business; also that the committee be authorized to sit during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Without objection, the resolution will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3) providing revenue for the Philippine Islands.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. OLMSTED in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3) known as "the Philippine tariff bill," which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3) to amend an act entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," approved March 8, 1902.

Be it enacted, etc., that the second section of the act entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," approved March 8, 1902, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That on and after the passage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands the rates of duty which are required to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from foreign countries: Provided, That all articles wholly the growth and product of the Philippine Islands coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands shall hereafter be admitted free of duty, except sugar and tobacco, manufactured and unmanufactured, upon which there shall be levied, collected, and paid only 25 per cent of the rates of duty aforesaid: And provided further, That the rates of duty which are required hereby to be levied, collected, and paid upon products of the Philippine Islands coming into the United States shall be less any duty or taxes levied, collected, and paid thereon upon the shipment thereof from the Philippine Islands, as provided by the act of the United States Philippine Commission referred to in section 1 of this act, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; but all articles the growth and product of the Philippine Islands admitted into the ports of the United States free of duty under the provisions of this act, and coming directly from said islands to the United States for use and consumption therein, shall be hereafter exempt from any export duties imposed in the Philippine Islands: Provided, That in consideration of the rates of duty aforesaid, all articles wholly the growth and product of the United States, going into the Philippine Islands, shall hereafter be admitted free of duty, except sugar and tobacco, manufactured and unmanufactured, upon which no higher rate of duty shall be levied, collected, and paid than is laid upon articles of like character coming from the Philippine Islands into the United States: And provided further, That on and after the 11th day of April, 1909, all articles and merchandise going from the United States into the Philippine Islands, and all articles wholly the growth and product of the Philippine Islands coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands shall be admitted free of duty: And provided further, That in addition to said duty when levied and in case said articles are admitted into the United States free of duty, there shall be paid upon articles of merchandise of Philippine Islands manufacture coming into the United States and withdrawn for consumption or sale a tax equal to the internal-revenue tax imposed in the United States upon the like articles of merchandise of domestic manufacture; such tax to be paid by internal-revenue stamp or stamps to be purchased and provided by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and to be procured from the collector of internal revenue at or most convenient to the port of entry of said merchandise in the United States, and to be affixed under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe, and such articles of Philippine Islands manufacture mentioned in this proviso shall be exempt from payment of any tax imposed by the internal-revenue laws of the Philippine Islands: And provided further, That in addition to the duty hereinbefore provided when levied and in case said articles are admitted into the Philippine Islands free of duty, there shall be paid upon articles of merchandise manufactured in the United States and going into the Philippine Islands and withdrawn for consumption or sale, a tax equal to the internal-revenue tax imposed in the Philippine Islands upon the like articles of merchandise when manufactured in the Philippine Islands; such tax to be paid by internal-revenue stamps or otherwise as provided by the laws in force in the Philippine Islands upon the like articles; and such articles manufactured in the United States mentioned in this proviso and going into the Philippine Islands shall be exempt from payment of any tax imposed by the internal-revenue laws of the United States. All the moneys collected under this section as amended shall be paid over and disposed of as provided in section 4 of the act hereby amended, and shall not be covered into the Treasury of the United States."

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

Page 2, line 18, strike out the word "Provided" and the remaining lines of said page and line 1 of page 3 and insert in lieu thereof the following words, viz: "Provided, however, That in consideration of the rates of duty aforesaid sugar and tobacco, both manufactured and unmanufactured, wholly the growth and product of the United States, shall be admitted to the Philippine Islands from the United States free of duty."

Page 3, lines 15 and 16, strike out the words "purchased and;" and in line 17, after the word "procured," insert the words "by purchase."

At the end of the bill insert:

"SEC. 2. That on and after the day when this act shall go into effect all goods, wares, and merchandise previously imported from the Philippine Islands, for which no entry has been made, and all goods, wares, and merchandise previously entered without payment of duty and under bond for warehousing, transportation, or any other purpose, for which no permit of delivery to the importer or his agent has been issued, shall be subjected to the duties imposed by law prior to the passage of this act, and to no other duty upon the entry or the withdrawal thereof: Provided, That when duties are based upon the weight of merchandise deposited in any public or private bonded warehouse said duties shall be levied and collected upon the weight of such merchandise at the time of its entry."

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman from Wyoming says he desires to ask me a question before I begin.

Mr. MONDELL. I wish to ask the gentleman——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like order, so that we can hear this interlocutory performance over there.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order, so that the interlocutory proceedings may be heard. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. I wish to inquire, Mr. Chairman, if it is the intention of the gentleman in charge of the bill to give a reasonable time for discussion of this measure?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, it certainly is the intention of "the gentleman in charge of the bill" to do so. The bill comes up under the rules of the House; debate can only be stopped by order of the House. But aside from that, it is my intention, personally, to give ample time for a fair discussion of the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. About how much time?

Mr. PAYNE. "The gentleman" has not determined that in his mind. Debate will run into next week, undoubtedly.

Mr. MONDELL. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that there are a number of gentlemen on this side who would like to be heard in opposition to the bill, and I trust time will be so divided that the gentlemen on this side, and of course gentlemen on the other side, who are opposed to the measure will be given a fair proportion of time.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I would say to the gentleman from Wyoming that I think he is entirely safe in the discretion of the gentleman who occupies the chair, and who has a reputation for fairness in this House that he certainly will not sacrifice in this debate.

Mr. MONDELL. I simply wished to be assured that a reasonable time will be given and that the time will be divided fairly. I am sure that the distinguished Chairman will have no disposition to do otherwise.

Mr. PAYNE. I think the gentleman ought to be able to take my word for it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, at the outset I think, perhaps, I had better state what the bill seeks to do. As members of the committee know, the present law in regard to goods coming from the Philippine Islands enforces the duty of 75 per cent of the Dingley rates on all goods coming from the islands which are the products of those islands. This bill, from the date of its passage, would put upon the free list all the goods coming from those islands except sugar and tobacco and the manufactures of sugar and tobacco, and on sugar and tobacco and the manufactures of sugar and tobacco the rates would be 25 per cent of the Dingley tariff until the 11th day of April, 1909. That day is selected because at that date expires the ten-year period under the treaty of Paris, under which Spain was to have the same privileges as the United States regarding her trade with the Philippine Islands. Of course, the committee contends—at least members of the committee do—that Spain could not claim any privilege under that clause of the treaty, the privilege of the free entrance of goods from Spain into the islands, unless Spain concedes to the products of the Philippine Islands the same rate of duty that the United States concedes. But we have made that date for the reason that it is about the right time to forecast in the future the date when we shall get revenues enough in the Philippine Islands from internal taxation and from import duties from other countries to take care of the finances of the islands, including the system of education that we are extending over those islands, with ample provision, as we believe, for all the expenses of the islands from that day.

So we have provided that after the 11th day of April, 1909, all goods coming from the Philippine Islands to the United States and all goods going from the United States to the Philippine Islands the product of either section of the country shall enter free of any duty whatever. [Applause.] At that date we are to place the Philippine Islands upon the same plane as all the territory of the United States, so far as revenue laws are concerned.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are some of us who believe that we ought to have free trade with the Philippine Islands from this moment. We believe it is and has been a principle of the Government of the United States, ever since the adoption of the Constitution, that whenever any goods are sent from one section of the country to another they shall go without the imposition of any import tax. That was, perhaps, one of the difficult questions in the Constitutional Convention; but it was settled then and settled right, that from whatever section of the country any imports should be made into any other portion of the country, they should go unrestricted by any tax. The only reason we do not give absolute free trade at once is because of the need of the revenue. We are following the same principle that we followed in the case of Porto Rico. When that bill originated in the House of Representatives, known now as the Foraker bill, we provided a duty of 15 per cent of the Dingley rates on all goods coming from the island to the United States, and then we provided that all the revenues raised from this duty should not be covered into the Treasury of the United States, but should go directly, without any tax for expense of collection, into the treasury of Porto Rico, to be used in the government of that island. Porto Rico was then at peace with the United States, as it always had been. The people of that island submitted to the change of jurisdiction—nay, they hailed the change of jurisdiction with gratitude.

There are gentlemen sitting around me now who remember the storm of indignation that came upon our devoted heads because we did not let those goods in free at that time without any restrictions, without even 15 per cent or any per cent of the Dingley rates upon the goods coming here. I think the committee, of which I had the honor to be the chairman then, received more abuse from the newspapers of the country than any committee has ever received in this House within my recollection; and so general was this that they forgot to publish the fact that the 15 per cent of duty was levied to help the poor people in Porto Rico, to relieve them of the burden of taxation, provide for the expenses of their government, and build up a system of education; and it was months after the bill passed before the people of the United States, or some of them, found out that there was any such beneficent provision in that bill.

We are following in the same track to-day. They have not enough revenue in the Philippine Islands to dispense with the $800,000 of duty paid upon goods going from the United States into the islands, or to dispense with the smaller amount of duty—about half a million dollars this year—upon goods coming from the islands into the United States, or to dispense with the $600,000 of duty on goods coming from Spain to the Philippine Islands. They need that money in their revenues. They need it for the expenditures of the government; they need it to build up that grand system of education which the United States is extending all over those islands. We have now over half a million children in the public schools; you will find them in every village and in every hamlet in those islands. We need more of them. We are extending the system. It costs money, and the money must come from somewhere. So we levy it upon these goods for the next three years to provide this sum of money. They have lately instituted a tax (it has been running about a year) upon spirits and tobacco in the Philippine Islands. That is a new tax. It has not run altogether smoothly up to the present time. Those people are a little slow in learning new methods and new habits of taxation. They are a good deal like the people in the United States in that respect. There is some scolding, some kicking, and some seeking to avoid the tax, as well as some disarrangement of business; because it often happens that when a man is taxed he seeks to collect his share of the tax, or the whole of it, out of the man who sells him the commodity, and he also seeks to collect the whole tax out of the man to whom he sells, so that he can make a profit out of the transaction; and it has developed here in the distillation of spirits that some of these wealthy distillers have levied an amount equal to or in excess of the tax out of the people who sell them the raw material, and have also levied an amount in excess of the tax upon the people who purchase from them. Now, of course, it does not take a great deal of time for such things to adjust themselves, and in the long run the tax will prove successful. It is going to be a little higher next year than it was last; but still it is not over half as much as the tax upon the same articles in Porto Rico; it is not a third as much as it is upon some of the same articles in the United States. This tax is growing in favor, and by the time this limit comes about when we shall have free trade, and no revenue from the trade between the United States and the Philippine Islands, doubtless there will be sufficient revenue from the internal taxation and from that levied at the ports in the Philippine Islands upon goods coming from outside—from foreign countries.

Now, these are the general features of the bill. It is provided further that tobacco, sugar, and the manufactures thereof shall go from the United States into the Philippine Islands free of duty at once. Of course, we do not apprehend that much sugar will go there except a little refined sugar. Cigars and tobacco are different. We do expect that tobacco will go there and that some cigars will go there. Tobacco will go there, because for the prosperity of the cigar-making business in the islands, in order to enable them to hold their trade with the east, and especially with China, which absorbs 65 per cent of the whole output of cigars from those islands, it is necessary for them to have a better wrapper and a lighter wrapper than they are able to get now. Why, the heathen Chinee has got so civilized that, like the American dude, he must have a wrapper and a cigar of a different texture and of a lighter color or else it does not taste good to him. He even likes the bitter leaf that comes from Sumatra which he smokes. They are importing a little Sumatra leaf and wrapping that upon the cigars now. With free trade they believe they can take the Connecticut wrapper and put it upon those cigars and meet the competition, which is hard upon them now, from Germany with the Sumatra wrapper. Hence we have put that clause in the bill.

We have amended the bill in another particular. It came out on the hearings that when sugar had gone up a cent and a half a pound last winter some merchants bought up 39,000 tons of Philippine Islands sugar and brought it over to the port of New York to sell there. It took about three months to come on sailing vessels, and when it got to New York the bottom had dropped out of the market and sugar had got down to the old point, a cent and a half below the price at which it was when those people bought the sugar to import it there. The representative of those people appeared before the committee and told us these facts and wanted us to amend the bill so that that sugar should pay duty at the time it was withdrawn from bond for consumption, which, of course, after we pass this bill, would enable them to get it in here at 25 per cent of the Dingley rate and would take out of the Philippine treasury about $500,000 and transfer it to the pockets of the people who had bought up this sugar.

Now, we did not think that we were in the benevolent business to that extent, and so we have put in the second section of this bill, which provides that sugar shall pay a duty from the time it was put in the bonded warehouse or arrived in the ports of the United States, which will be 75 per cent of the Dingley rates, and the half million dollars will go into the treasury of the Philippine Islands to help educate these people over there. Now, these are the main points of this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I am unable to see why we should not treat the Philippine Islands exactly as we have treated Porto Rico. We have postponed it because the islands were in a state of war and insurrection; we have postponed it until they got upon their good behavior, until they sustained the government and obeyed the laws and maintained good order in the Philippine Islands, as do the little brown men in Porto Rico. The reason we have treated them differently has grown out of their insurrection, and because of the numbers of insurgents there. That is changed. The islands are pacified, and the people there have accepted the beneficent Government of the United States. The most of them are entirely satisfied with that Government, and will stay under the flag. The intelligent people in the islands, the well-educated people in the islands, believe that the time to sever their connection with the United States will not come in the next twenty-five years, if it comes at all. They believe the flag of the Republic carries beneficence with it. They have been led to believe that those who lived under the flag lived in a condition of prosperity and happiness, and they want a share in it, and it is because they want a share in that prosperity and happiness that they are demanding, they are asking, nay, they are praying to be put under the conditions which this bill will put them under, and give them only a fair show, if it gives them even that, to carry on their industries.

Now, the people of the islands are not all of them without prosperity. The hemp industry is an industry of wonderful prosperity. The only place on earth where manila hemp can be grown, where anything approaching it can be grown, is in the Philippine Islands. They have extended it, they are extending it to-day, and notwithstanding the multiplication of the product, the price has increased, and so where this hemp is raised the people are prosperous. It is made from a plant called "abaca," a sort of species of banana. They plant it and it seems to be a perennial crop for a series of years, and all they have to do is to harvest it. And yet, so great has been the demand for it in the past few years, and so greatly have wages increased in these islands in the past few years, that even the common ordinary laborers in the hemp district receive wages equal to two and three and four dollars of American money a day. And so the people engaged in that particular branch of industry are prosperous and the industry is growing. It amounts to considerably over two-thirds of the exports of the islands. I think the exports last year of this hemp amounted to twenty-two millions out of thirty-two millions of the total exports.

The next industry of importance in these islands is that of the raising of cocoanut trees and harvesting the fruit, and then drying the meat, grinding it, and putting it on the market as the copra of commerce. This has been a profitable industry, and is a profitable industry to-day, and is growing very largely. A cocoanut tree is planted, and after four or five years you begin to get the fruit. The tree lives for one hundred years, needs no cultivation, and the only labor is gathering the fruit and preparing the meat for commerce. A cocoanut tree will produce from 4 to 8 pesos' worth of fruit a year—two to four dollars a year—and so that has become a profitable industry, and attracts a great many laborers in the islands.

The difficulty about rapidly extending these two industries is the difficulty of getting laborers to perform the work in the field. A Filipino is different from the American in some respects. He is a greater lover of his home than is the average American, a greater lover of his locality. He is not a traveled man. You find many of them that have never been beyond the circle of 3 or 4 miles from where they live. It is the hardest work in the world, it is like tearing them up by the roots, to get them away from their homes to go even for a few months to do duty in the hemp fields and among the cocoanut trees or in the sugar plantations. In Negros, where eight-tenths of the sugar is raised, every year there are six months when they have to get laborers from all over the islands to go there and help them grind the sugar. They do not like to go even for six months. The shortage of labor in the vicinity is one of the things that must be overcome before these industries will reach even greater proportions than they have reached in these islands.

Copra exports amount to $4,000,000 a year; sugar, I think, to about two millions; perhaps a little more than that this last year under the large prices that were obtained; tobacco, unmanufactured, about $1,000,000; cigars and cigarettes a million dollars more, and the rest is made up of sundries—the exportations from the islands. Now, Mr. Chairman, of course it is natural for a man who has a dollar invested, when he thinks or even dreams that that dollar is menaced, to get into a sort of hysteria, and in that condition he is quite apt to exaggerate the circumstances surrounding that investment. So it is that it is easy to send out telegrams from the city of Washington and get replies addressed to Members of the House stating that certain industries are threatened, and alleging some of the most fantastic stories, made out of whole cloth, in regard to their particular industry. So it is that there has been circulated throughout the United States the story that there are 60,000,000 acres out of 72,000,000 acres in the islands that are arable lands. My colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], says 50,000,000. I think one man put it as modestly as 50,000,000, but some of them at 60,000,000. Now, what are the facts? Why, our people have been looking into that thing over there; they have not been idle during the seven years of occupation, and they estimate that not to exceed 9 per cent of that 72,000,000 acres of land can ever be cultivated for any purpose whatever so far as agriculture is concerned. Now, there is quite a difference between 9 per cent and 60 or 70 or 80 per cent.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Where does the gentleman obtain his authority for that statement?

Mr. PAYNE. From the census of the Philippine Islands, taken in 1903.

Mr. MONDELL. I have not been able to discover any statement that there were only 9 per cent.

Mr. PAYNE. There are four volumes of that census, and if the gentleman looks assiduously he will find it there, because I have seen it.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman recall the page?

Mr. PAYNE. I can not give it to the gentleman now, but I shall give it to him one of these days before this debate closes. I can turn to it very readily, but I do not seem to have a note of the page here. Further than that, Mr. Chairman, it appears also from the census that 4.6 per cent of these 72,000,000 acres, or a trifle over half of all the available lands, are now under cultivation. Over one-half of these available lands are already taken up in the Philippine Islands. Now, I am not surprised at this statement in the census, Mr. Chairman, when I compare the topography of the Philippine Islands with the topography of the islands of Japan. Japan has been cultivating those islands for two thousand five hundred years, and they have built terraces all up the mountain sides in many localities where they could get a terrace to hang on and get a place as large as the size of an ordinary man's hand—if he has a large hand—in which to grow rice. Yet the statement is made that in all the territory of Japan less than 12 per cent of it is under cultivation after two thousand five hundred years of improvement. And the improvements that they have made are wonderful where these people have been able to make them in order that they might raise rice and the other crops that are raised there. Still there is less than 12 per cent of those islands under cultivation. Now, in view of that, it would seem that these fantastic statements which are sent around to have their effect, from interested parties, that there are so many millions of acres of land there that they can cultivate and raise sugar enough to supply the whole earth ought not to have any lodgment even in the brain of a man exclusively engaged as an attorney to appear before the Committee on Ways and Means on behalf of the beet-sugar interests of the country.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAYNE. I suppose so, but I would rather not be interrupted every moment.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, if the gentleman does not care to be interrupted——

Mr. PAYNE. Not every moment; but I will answer this question.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I simply wish to ask if the gentleman classes as fantastic the statement of Secretary Taft that the Philippine Islands contain infinitely more arable land than Japan?

Mr. PAYNE. I think it was, if he stated so.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Made prior to the census, also.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. And the other statements I suppose that the gentleman made before the committee are to be classed with that and have the same weight?

Mr. PAYNE. Well, now, Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to take up the gentleman's side of this case, to which he is a recent convert, at this stage of the proceedings. It is true that Secretary Taft when he first went down there did think there was more arable land than in Japan. He had sailed through Japan and he had sailed into the islands. It is true he stated before the Committee on Insular Affairs of the House that he thought the islands could produce as much sugar as Cuba—not sugar for the world, but as much sugar as Cuba—at the same time saying he did not know much about the production of Cuba when he was before that committee; but he did not have the light that the census taken in 1903 has thrown upon it, where an examination was made and some attempt made to estimate the amount of the agricultural lands in those islands. Why, Mr. Chairman, those islands have been producing sugar for fifty years and more. They produced it under the Spanish régime. They extended the industry under the Spanish régime. Spain gave them a big bonus on their sugar by way of a differential duty. Spain charged 6.22 a pound against the sugar of the balance of the world, while they admitted the sugar from the islands at 2.96. There was a differential of 3.26 a pound in favor of the Philippine Islands under the Spanish possessions. They had that difference in the Spanish markets. They had it for years during the most of the Spanish régime. Well, now, it is said the Philippines sent great quantities of sugar to Spain, and that illustrates the contention that those Filipinos are making to-day, and what is that? Why, that their principal market was China and Hongkong and Japan up to the time of the Russian war. I think 60 per cent, perhaps not as much as that, on the average, goes to China and Kongkong, distributed generally in China, and they say those cunning heathen Chinese, when they are marketing the sugar, take advantage of the necessities of the man who is going to sell to them. I have heard some hint of that kind of thing being done in civilized Christian American, but if they find no other market they take advantage of that and buy as cheaply as they can, and so they did; but when this Spanish concession of 3.26 came in they had a market open to Spain and they could say to Mr. John Chinaman, "If you do not want sugar at that price, we will send it to Spain if it does take three or four months and we have to wait a long time for the return," and all that sort of thing.

So they increased the output. They got up to 300,000 tons a year, 80,000 tons of which was consumed in the islands and a little over 200,000 tons exported from the islands under the Spanish régime, and they were seeking out the available sugar lands for culture; and they cultivated altogether 400,000 acres, that produced 300,000 tons of sugar, the same sugar lands that in the heated imagination of these gentlemen are to produce an average of from 6 to 8 tons per acre the minute this bill is passed. They claim that it will all pass under cultivation almost from the drop of the hat. They had an incentive then in the differential duty of 3.26. We are proposing to take off a duty of nine-tenths cent a pound on the sugar, and still this wonderful change is to be made when we take off a cent a pound, when Spain had 3 cents off for years and they could only reach a production of 300,000 tons a year.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. I know that the gentleman wants to be entirely fair and absolutely accurate, and I have a high regard for his great knowledge on this subject, but the gentleman does not intend, I think, to tell the House that the Philippines at any time had a differential of 3 cents or anything like it, because the gentleman recollects at all times there was a consumption tax, so that this differential was cut down by the amount of consumption, because it was genrally about two-thirds of the differential.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I was making my statement based upon the official report and also upon the statements of the beet-sugar men who appeared before the committee. I know they made some statements which were mistaken, and possibly they were mistaken in this, but I have always taken it as a rule that an admission made by a man against his own interest was the highest sort of evidence in the case.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what will be the effect of the passage of this bill reducing this rate of duty to 33 cents a hundred pounds, or a third of a cent a pound, upon the sugar industry in the Philippine Islands? I do not believe it is going to give them a market in the United States. I do not believe it is relief enough to help them here—at least I am very much in doubt about it—for the three years that this duty is to be placed upon the sugar. It will stimulate the price in China. We have examined a good deal into the cost of sugar in the Philippine Islands under their present methods, which, of course, can be improved if we could get the capital to go over there; and yet with the improved methods in the Hawaiian Islands they do not seem to have revolutionized the cost of sugar. They have better sugar lands there than they have in the Philippine Islands. They have had free sugar into the United States for about thirty years—absolutely free. They have built up an industry there in the Hawaiian Islands of 370,000 tons a year. They have some very rich lands. They have some lands there that have produced the record crop of the world. I saw some land near Pearl Harbor—land bought by the Government of the United States, but now under the control of the former owners on a certain leasehold arrangement—where they told me that in one year they had produced between 11 and 12 tons of sugar per acre. That was a single plantation. The managers of that plantation say that they do not think the extra amount of sugar pays for the extra expense in cultivation and in fertilizing.

Mr. McGAVIN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. McGAVIN. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York what the reason is for excluding sugar from the absolutely free list?

Mr. PAYNE. I am sorry that my friend was not here when I commenced. I said that the only reason was for the sake of revenue. They need the revenue. There is no other reason that I know of.

A MEMBER. How much will it produce?

Mr. PAYNE. This year it will produce, on the present rate of duty, I think, $700,000. I have not the figures in my head now, but it will produce considerable revenue this year.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. PAYNE. I think I will have to decline to yield until I get through. I can not spend all of the time answering questions.

Mr. FORDNEY. I wanted to ask the gentleman a question before he finished; that is all. I do not wish to interrupt him. I simply desire information.

Mr. PAYNE. That is all right. I would like to go on for a little while without so many questions. A question draws me away from the point I have in my mind.

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not want to do that.

Mr. PAYNE. I remember now that I was talking about Hawaii, and free sugar there, and the result. Mr. Hatch, who is retained by the business people of Hawaii to look after their interests in Washington, appeared before the committee. He does not want this bill to pass, and they do not want this bill to pass. They are afraid that it will jeopardize something in Hawaii if this bill passes. Still, he tells about the result there. While these lands that I have referred to produce 11 to 12 tons per acre on this one plantation, they are able to produce but from 2 to 3 tons per acre on the average land in the island. The highest average was 4 tons in 1901. And they say that on their investment of $65,000,000 in plantations the last two years the return was 2.7 per cent profit in the whole island. Now, if with American capital and Hawaiian capital, if with the best machinery in the world, if with steam plows and the highest and best methods of cultivation for producing sugar in the world, this is the result after thirty years of free trade with the United States, what in the name of common sense has any interest in the United States to fear from the Philippine Islands?

Why, Mr. Chairman, I visited one of those plantations in the Philippines and saw a sugar mill. They had a carabao power with which to grind the cane. They had a carabao at each end of it, and a boy to drive each carabao. They had a three-roller mill, and they fed the rollers with one stalk at a time.

Some one suggested that they undertake to put in two. Our friend the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr HILL], who is always fertile in ideas, got them to put in two, and the thing stopped. The carabaos could not move it, and they had to pull one of the canes out and call men to push the levers before they could get the thing started. They ran the juice into a vat, and then dipped it up on to a platform and put it into the caldron there for boiling, and made the sugar in that way. I do not know how many men they had at work out there. I should say thirty to forty workmen stood about there grinding the cane. I have seen a good many cane fields, but I never saw a cane field where the cane was any poorer than in that field. Now, you expect these people, with these crude methods, without any understanding of the modern means of producing sugar, to walk at once into the position of the Hawaiian Islands, and be able to come into your markets and sell sugar here at the extravagant profit of 2.7 per cent profit on the capital invested. That is what all this potter is about in resisting the passage of this bill at 25 per cent of the Dingley duties.

Mr. MONDELL. I hesitate to interrupt the gentleman; but if he will yield to a question——

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I will this once, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman persists in recurring to the case of Hawaii. I suppose from the gentleman's numerous visits to that island he discovered that the plantation owners have long since capitalized our duty, and that the Hawaiian plantations are capitalized at four to six times what they cost, and they are making less than 3 per cent upon the cost of the plantation, but it is because of the enormous overcapitalization there.

Mr. PAYNE. "The gentleman" does not know any such thing; and that thing is denied by gentlemen whom I met there, with all the apparent candor of my friend from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. I happened to be in Hawaii at the time that this process was going on.

Mr. PAYNE. Does the gentleman say sugar plantations in Hawaii were capitalized four to six times their cost?

Mr. MONDELL. I was saying I happened to be in the islands at the time when the bill passed making Hawaii a part of the United States, when the business of increasing the capital of Hawaiian sugar plantations was going on at a very rapid rate, and one plantation had its capital multiplied four times in less than two months.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, now, Mr. Chairman, it may have been true about one plantation. The gentleman may have been there, Mr. Chairman, when some of the sugar plantations may have done as one of these plantations did in the Philippine Islands—put in new machinery with modern methods, or was about to do it, and increased its capital stock. He may have been there and seen one thing of that kind done; but of course, Mr. Chairman, one swallow does not make a summer. I believe the gentlemen who have lived there all these years have had an opportunity to know better than my friend from Wyoming on a single visit. I know they know more than I did on one visit. I admit it for myself and am willing to acknowledge it for him. I take it from the statements of these gentlemen, whose word I would receive anywhere and always, who told me that the capital stock of the companies was not greater and generally did not equal the investment in the plants to-day.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it would seem that having cited Hawaii and the experience there, that I should have carried conviction even to the souls of the gentlemen who are engaged in the manufacture of beet sugar and raising cane sugar in Louisiana. But I will go a little further into this question. Mr. Chairman, it is always difficult to find out exactly the cost of a thing. You go into my section of the country and try to find out how much it costs to raise a bushel of potatoes and how many different answers would you get? My people are like the rest of the people. Many of them do not know how much it costs. It costs one man four times as much to raise a bushel of potatoes as it does another, and then it depends upon the crop and upon the year; and that is so with everything raised in agriculture.

It costs different prices to raise an acre each of sugar cane on adjoining plantations in the State of Louisiana, and so it does in the Philippine Islands. You have got to get these different statements and put them all together to see what the average cost is. In some places it is high and in some places it is low. Some witnesses testified that it cost them $1.76 a hundred to raise sugar and deliver it at the port of Iloilo; and all the sugar there is shipped from two ports—Iloilo and Manila—and most of it from Iloilo, coming from the island of Negros, where eight-tenths of the sugar is raised. Some say the cost there is $1.76, some say it has cost them more, some say it has cost them less. Some put it at $1.41, others at $1.50; but a low average of all those prices would be $1.50 for the cost of sugar delivered at Iloilo.

Now, I am aware that Mr. Hathaway, representing a combination of seven or nine factories in the State of Michigan, and a beet-sugar man—he says he is not a beet-sugar expert—was sent over there to find out about this thing last summer. He went around the islands. He did not get what he wanted. He said: "I represent a capital of $10,000,000, ready to be invested in sugar plantations in the Philippine Islands. I want to buy some land of you."

Well, now, what would a Yankee do who was the owner of that land if he was raising potatoes on it or sugar beets? Would he not indulge in what these people over there call "poetry;" would he not indulge in imagination? Did you ever see two men swapping old broken-down horses but what each one of them could go a mile in three minutes or in two and a half? So it is with these people trying to sell their sugar lands. If Hathaway tells the truth, they figured down the price of producing sugar to a cent a pound or even less in some instances. He did not tell of the other instances where they put it above, but we found plenty of people who were willing to testify that it cost more. Mr. Hathaway went there with that proclamation, and even proposed in some instances options on land, and he got the appropriate story. This is the expert sent there by the beet-sugar interests. Well, they do not raise beet sugar in the Philippine Islands. Why did they not send a sugar-cane expert to those islands? In the Taft party there was a sugar-cane expert. He has appeared before the committee at every hearing they have had since I have been a member of the committee, since 1889, when the sugar industry has been a subject of consideration. He is an intelligent man—Colonel Hill, of New Orleans. He went there with the Taft party. He made it his special business to go around to the sugar plantations and see the operation of them. We had these hearings here for four days, New Orleans being about twenty-four hours, I believe, from Washington, and for the first time that the committee ever had hearings during my connection with it Colonel Hill did not appear. We did not hear anything of his offering to buy sugar lands down there for the purpose of getting the story.

We asked Mr. Hathaway why he did not invest. Well, he gave two reasons. One of them was that he was not sure enough of the United States Government down there and of the integrity of the future personnel of that Government to risk his money in buying lands and investing. And yet he sees a whole cloud of capitalists in the United States ready to go down to the Philippine Islands and develop the sugar lands there—sufficient to swamp every farmer in Michigan and in Colorado and in my Congressional district—because we have a beet-sugar factory there—sufficient to swamp them all with cheap sugar from the Philippine Islands. That is one reason why they did not invest. The other reason I will proceed to talk about later. That is the Brussels convention matter, upon which I may have some reflections to make as I proceed.

A dollar and a half at Iloilo. Then there comes the freight to New York, 30 cents a hundred.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I want to say just a word to the gentleman from New York. Much of his speech is inaudible, and I am sitting within 15 feet of the gentleman. I wish he would endeavor to talk a little louder. I know that he can. His speech is most interesting.

Mr. PAYNE. A dollar and a half a hundred, Mr. Chairman, at Iloilo; 30 cents for freight to New York, possibly including insurance. That is $1.80. That allows nothing for loading the vessel at Iloilo and nothing for unloading it in the city of New York; nothing for commissions paid to commission merchants and nothing for interest during the three months the ship is on the voyage.

Now, Mr. Hathaway came in with some figures on shipping. He said that sometimes the rate was a little lower than this. That is possibly true, but the regular prevailing rate is what I have stated. He disputed the cost of insurance, and said that some got it at half the rate. Of course they do, for some ship it on steam vessels and it does not take a third of the time to get it over. Then it is not so hazardous as shipment by sailing vessels, and so they get it cheaper. But the regular rate, the ordinary rate, the rate that the ordinary man must pay, is as high as I have stated. That does not figure anything for interest, and, oh, how those people have to pay interest sometimes in the Philippine Islands—30 or 40 per cent a year for interest. Not all of them, but some of them. Why? Because the business has been so poor that they have not the money to go ahead and make a crop, and they have not the credit to get the money afterwards.

Mr. Hathaway said that you could loan money down there and have it paid in sugar at 1 cent a pound delivered at Iloilo. I would not wonder if he could find some one who would do that, but in order to do it he must cheat the laboring man out of his hire. In order to do that he must go through without paying his debts, and we can not calculate upon any such price for sugar as that.

Mr. Chairman, has my time expired?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has just expired.

Mr. DALZELL. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] be permitted to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman from New York answer a question?

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman will kindly wait until I get through, I shall be happy to answer any question he may ask me. Now, Mr. Chairman, it was stated in Manila by Mr. Wellborn, the commissioner of agriculture, that the quality of sugar they ship to New York was of such a low degree of purity that they had to accept a cent a pound less for that raw sugar than was paid for other cane sugar at the port of New York. That is the condition on which they ship it there, and, of course, in estimating that cost you must add that cent a pound, and you get 2.80 for the sugar. I can readily see how this can be, because figure up the degrees of the sugar, and it makes considerably over one-half cent difference between that and 95-degree sugar coming from Cuba and the West Indies, and then with the impurities in the sugar besides that you can readily see that they are compelled to take a cent less, and that the buyer can not afford to give any more than that for their sugar. Well, there you have 2.80 a pound. Then you get it into New York, and that is without taking into account the unloading charges in New York and the commissions in New York and the warehousing in New York, because this sugar starts from Manila three months before it is marketed, and the market may be changed and the man may be compelled to hold it in order to get out even on it. The refiner charges 1 cent a pound. Gentlemen may figure that it does not cost more than sixty-five one-hundredths to refine sugar. I do not believe it does; but I never supposed the sugar trust was in it for their health. I never knew of their taking less than they can get, and these people have to pay them a cent a pound. That makes 3.80 as the cost of sugar without any duty—that is, the cost of refined sugar in the port of New York. Well, at 25 per cent we levy a duty of 33 cents a hundred, and that makes 4.13 for the next three years upon this sugar.

Mr. FORDNEY. What grade of sugar is that?

Mr. PAYNE. It is what they call "assorted" sugar; it runs from 70 up to 88.

Mr. FORDNEY. It is not 96° pure?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, no; they do not have a pound of 96 sugar; far below it. That is the cost of that sugar ready for the market—4.13 in the city of New York. That is the sugar that is going to grow so rapidly in quantity when they reduce the duty to 25 per cent of the Dingley rate; that is the sugar that is going to occupy the lands that are not arable in order to depress the beet-sugar industry in the United States; that is the sugar that is to overcome the labor question, which is the most serious question in the Philippine Islands regarding agriculture, and it is in a different condition to-day than it was when we went there. Somehow the American flag seems to raise the condition of a man as to his capacity and ability and worth, and wherever it goes wages go up.

Why, the Spaniards used to pay about 20 cents a day for people employed in the navy-yard in the mechanical department. We have 3,000 of them there now, and we are paying 65 cents a day in gold. White & Co., contractors doing the government work there, are employing some men who are occupying their houses at the mouth of the harbor, in getting out granite, at 50 cents a day, but they are not so skillful men. The men on public works in the city are paid 40 and 50 cents a day in gold.

Now, these gentlemen come in with a reference to an agricultural report printed in August, 1904, and say that it contradicts Mr. Welborn in his statement. Why? He said he had been out on the sugar plantations before light and seen men sitting there ready to go to work. That would seem to look like a hard statement, but they do not work there the same hours of the day that Americans do. When it gets to be 11 o'clock and the sun comes straight down the Filipino has sense enough to go into his house and take his siesta in the middle of the day, and he gets out again about 3 o'clock in the afternoon, and it is a common saying among them that nobody is fool enough to go out between the hours of 11 and 3 o'clock except Americans and dogs. [Laughter.] The Filipino does not do it. He has to commence early in the morning in order to get in his eight hours' work, and he hardly ever goes beyond that. And so he might well be sitting there before light in order to go to work. Then he tells the price that he saw these men paid. Yes; that is true; but that was before the prices got up in the sugar district, before the advanced spirit had seized these people up there in the sugar district; they had not advanced the wages. Now, the universal testimony is that two and three and four times as much is paid; that they pay 30 cents and upward a day in the sugar districts for the laborers that used to be paid 5 and 10 cents a day in that same district.

The people are getting some idea of what they are capable of. Wages have advanced, so if we get machinery and skillful men wages will advance still more. Now, where are we going to get the laborers? That has been a question that has been asked. Oh, they say, we will get the cooly laborer in there. Is there a man within the sound of my voice who ever believes that the House of Representatives, by a majority vote, will allow the cooly laborer to go in there or on one foot of American soil or of soil belonging to the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I would like the gentleman in that connection to state also what the almost universal expression of opinion among business men in the Philippine Islands was as to that importation of labor.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I did not see but one man in the whole islands who was in favor of it, and that was a Doctor Gomez, who appeared before the Commission to advocate immediate independence, and I wish every man in this House would read Doctor Gomez on the subject of immediate independence. He said he represented the labor interests and he wanted the free importation of the cooly laborer into the islands. He wanted them there, and he is the only man who did want them there. Every other man deprecated the idea. He is a precious bit of humanity, this Doctor Gomez, and I hope you will all read him. His history is told by himself in that testimony. No; they do not want cooly laborers there. Now, it is said that three or four years ago the insular government was having some ships built over there or boats for the interisland trade, and they had to go to Hongkong to get them built. It occurred to them that they might teach the Filipinos to build ships; so they asked Congress to allow Chinese shipbuilders to come in—skilled mechanics—to teach these Filipinos how to build ships. They were to come in for a period of five years and then be deported. These were skilled men. No one in the insular government ever dreamed that we were to have an importation of cooly laborers there to go into the sugar fields of the Philippine Islands. Why, there are about 44,000 Chinamen in the islands, and, so far as I can learn, not a single one of them is engaged in the sugar industry. They are merchants, stevedores, and work in the cities; they are clerks in the banks, as they are throughout the whole Orient, even in Japan, and all that sort of thing. They do not get out into the field to labor—not much. So that bugaboo disappears, Mr. Chairman.

Now, there is another difficulty about expanding this industry. Three years ago they had the rinderpest there among the carabao. The carabao is the draft animal in the Philippine Islands. There is no other than the carabao. He is an amphibious animal—webfooted. He has to get into a mudhole or in water about once an hour before he is fit to go to work again. It is said that they get sort of crazy unless they are allowed to do so. Of course they are a fit animal to plow with in a mudhole, and that is where their plowing is generally done, because there is a rainfall of 150 inches a year in those islands. The rainfall is 50 inches in the Hawaiian Islands. That is the way they do their plowing. It is discouraging work to stand and look at a carabao before a plow. He walks almost half as fast as an ox, and they have to have two of them—one in the mudhole while the other is at work—to one man. Now, that is the motive power on the farms. A few years ago they had the rinderpest and that took away in some localities 50 per cent, and in some 80 per cent, of these carabaos. Some say that an average of 80 per cent of the carabaos in all the islands was destroyed. They are recuperating by the method nature has provided, and the carabao is increasing, but they have not yet effectually stamped out the rinderpest. They have a serum there which they inject, and some of the natives contend that the serum is more dangerous than the disease. I am told that that is because of the unskillful way in which the operation is sometimes performed. They think they are getting the advantage of it, and they are going to have the carabao there, but it will take years to fill up the waste places left by the carabaos that have been destroyed.

Then they come with their siren song about the mule power in the islands, and they had the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture in August, 1904, that he had imported so many mules, so many horses, and so many cows, and they said that those were all alive, but it turned out that they were pretty much all dead. They could not stand the climate. Why, on the government farm they have a few mules. They were the mules that were condemned and retired by the War Department—that is, they were sent out there and retired without pay, so to speak, and sold. They have become acclimated there in the islands. They were the survival of the fittest. They do very fair work on the government farm, and there was not so much ravage of disease among them as there was of the newly imported. They got past that; they were immune. There were but a few of them.

They have got to stand the climate. They have got to stand the surra, which is so devastating to the force of mules down there. I think they would be much better draft animals than the carabao, but the planters have got to take the carabao. They have some oxen there. They brought some from China and some from Australia; still I think that these were subject to the rinderpest, and they could not stand it. Now, there is that problem that has to be surmounted before there is an increase in the production of sugar in the Philippine Islands—the labor problem, the draft-animal problem, and then there is the problem of capital. Why, Mr. Hathaway would have us believe he went down there armed and equipped to buy all the sugar plantations and erect factories, with millions behind him to do this thing, and still he turns back with the flimsy excuse that he has not confidence enough in the government we have put in there to invest his dollars. Where is the capital coming from, if such men as he will back out with such a flimsy excuse as that from the investment of capital, to develop the sugar industry in those islands? Four and thirteen one-hundredths cents a pound in New York for refined sugar or 3.80 without any duty whatever after three years. Who is that going to hurt? Let us look into it a little, because we have gone into this thing and investigated it somewhat.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I listened with delight to the gentleman's description of the Philippine Islands and the method of procedure in the way of agriculture, etc., which has been very entertaining, and some of his descriptions have destroyed my ideas as to the worth of those islands. I believe it is a matter of history that we paid at least $20,000,000 for them. From the gentleman's description I would like to ask him now if he does not think we paid too much for the islands?

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I can answer that question and will do so cheerfully. I never wanted to pay a dollar for those islands. I never wanted to see the United States exercise jurisdiction over those islands. It was against my judgment and my inclination, and I only yielded to it because we seemed to have got there and destroyed the only form of law and order existing, and if we gave them up we sent them at each other's throats and we left them without organized government, we left them to the prey of the midnight assassin and the cruelty of the Moro or of the Filipino, whichever might happen to be in the majority at the time. [Applause on the Republican side.] So I yielded gracefully and accepted what little portion I had to bear of the white man's burden in the Philippine Islands, and when we got them I thought it was our duty to deal fairly by them. Nay, I thought it was our "plain duty" to deal fairly with them.

Mr. Chairman, I thought it was our duty to educate them and lift them up and try to make them equal to some sort of citizenship; equal to the task of governing themselves. I never went into it as a matter of dollars and cents, as far as I was concerned. I did not go into the Spanish war that way, and gentlemen remember here how earnestly I protested against the declaration of war with Spain. I am not ashamed of it. I am proud of it. I stood by President McKinley, Thomas B. Reed, JOSEPH G. CANNON, Nelson Dingley, JOHN DALZELL, General GROSVENOR, and other men in this House protesting against the hysteria that carried away 106 Members of this side of the House who joined in that side for the purpose of declaring war against Spain. I believed then that William McKinley would work out the problem and free Cuba without the spilling of a drop of American blood. I believe that if he could have held on for sixty days longer he would have worked out the problem and we never would have been here to-day discussing the sugar question in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. PAYNE. I do.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. It would be interesting to all of us who took part in the affairs of the House at that time if the gentleman will state now what problem he had in his mind that could have been worked out which would have brought us to the desired end.

Mr. PAYNE. I did not catch the last part of the gentleman's question.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. What was the method that could have been employed to work out our salvation?

Mr. PAYNE. President McKinley was working it out by the usual diplomatic methods between two peaceful powers, the United States and Spain, and from what I have since heard I believe he would have accomplished that. Information came to me afterwards from the Spanish Government, through a gentleman who had information from them at the time, but that day is past.

We went into the war. I stood by it as a patriotic American citizen. I wanted the war waged, as it was waged, honorably, decisively, and with celerity. We brought honor to our arms. We accomplished a protectorate, or whatever you may call it—the Platt amendment relation with Cuba—and we got Porto Rico, and in addition we got the Philippine Islands for $20,000,000. And here we are. We have them. We have got to stay by them. Honor demands it. Give them independent government to-day and what have we got? If there is a warlike individual in the world, he is the Moro of the Orient, the Moor, the Mohammedan, who believes he should protect every sort of animal life except human life, and that he is entitled to credit in the next world if he kills an enemy. And he hates the Filipino. But if there was a conflict between the two, I think the Moro would win out in the end. There would be war in a minute. We went down to Zamboanga, and there we received a petition for a separate Territorial government for the islands inhabited by the Moros. Why? Congress in its wisdom had provided, under the leadership of my friend from Wisconsin, for a general assembly, which meets now in about a year or a year and a half, I think, in the islands—a branch of the legislature, to be elected by a small percentage of voters, by those who are qualified among the natives down there. They say that in that assembly the Filipino will be in the majority, and they do not propose to submit to the rule of any Filipino, so they wanted a separate Territorial government for the Moro.

That shows the feeling between these people. Independent native government would not last as long as it would take to proclaim the fact, but you would have anarchy from the word "Go!" We must stay there, if we have any respect for our national honor, and work out this problem which seems to have fallen to us, which we are working out, and which, under the providence of God, we will accomplish in the end; and we will give these people education in the line of schools, in the line of labor and industrial application, that will lift them up; and will give them all one language, and that is the language in which we speak. All of this is being accomplished. We will annihilate the thirty to fifty different dialects, so that each tribe can converse with the member of any other tribe; in other words, try to make them a homogeneous people when the time comes, not in a day, but after a generation or two generations have passed; and when the American people have accomplished this herculean task the question will be up to our children, not to us, whether we will still hold them or whether we will let them go and let them try to work out their own salvation with the equipment we have given them.

But for all practical purposes we are there to stay. There is as much to stay there for as in Porto Rico. We owe them the same duty that we owe to Porto Rico. It is as much our plain duty to pass this bill as it was in 1900 to put upon the statute book the beneficent act that was written there for the Porto Rican people.

But I was talking about the production of sugar in the United States and the cost of it, having arrived at the lowest cost of 3.80 per cent for refined sugar under free trade in 1909, laid down in New York. A gentleman representing the sugar-cane interests in Louisiana, an intelligent man, appeared before our committee. Mr. Hill told us last winter that in 1902 they raised sugar at three and a half cents a pound. That is not refined sugar, but 96° centrifugal sugar. He told us they had reduced the cost in the campaign of 1904 and 1905 to 3½ cents a pound. Now, this was the statement of Colonel Hill; but I notice he omitted to tell us what he got for molasses which was made in the process of manufacturing all of this sugar. He forgot to state what they did with the molasses. I know that in some countries they get equal to half a cent a pound on the sugar for molasses. I do not suppose in Louisiana they throw it away. I do not believe they do. They have the modern methods and modern machinery there. There is nothing stated about that, but he said their estimate of cost of 3½ cents a pound was based on 125 pounds of sugar to the ton of cane. Well, if that is so, sugar did not cost them 3½ cents a pound for the cane they did produce. According to the official statement they produced cane down there that yielded 146½ pounds of sugar, on an average, for eight years.

It does not cost much more to get a hundred and forty-six and one-half pounds than it does to get 125 pounds, if it is there. And when you take this into consideration and it is reduced from 3 cents a pound to two and six-tenths for sugar, adding a cent for refining, it means 3.6 cents against three and eight-tenths for Philippine sugar laid down in New York. That is not all.

Doctor Wiley, who is Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry in the Department of Agriculture, stated before the United States Industrial Commission in 1900 that Louisiana planters were then selling sugar at 2¾ cents and making more money than ever before. That sugar could not have cost them 3 cents if they were selling it at 2¾ cents and making money on it.

Now, gentlemen, do you see any particular menace to the sugar industry of Louisiana, contending against free sugar from the Philippine Islands? Why, they say, there is so much land in the Philippine Islands. Did you ever stop to think how many million of acres of land there are in Louisiana—level land that can be used for the cultivation of sugar? They have got about 300,000 tons now, and they have not developed it beyond that, although they have had all this protection and all this land. If they had occupied all of the land they could have produced sugar in Louisiana for the entire consumption of this country—3,000,000 tons.

It takes time to do these things. It takes time for people to make up their minds to put capital into investment in these things. Then you have to have labor to do it with.

Mr. NORRIS. Can the gentleman give us any idea of the amount of land in the Philippine Islands that could be used for this purpose?

Mr. PAYNE. I gave that fully in the first part of my remarks.

Mr. NORRIS. I was not in the Hall at that time.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not think I should repeat it. You will find it in the RECORD.

Before the passage of this law taxing alcohol they used to get an average of $1\frac{6}{10}$ pesos for 4 gallons of cane molasses for the purpose of distilling it into rum. One and six-tenths would be equal to 80 cents in gold. Could not they get as much as that in New Orleans for the molasses that goes into the distillery? And yet Colonel HILL says that there is no money with the price at 3 cents a pound. They talk about cheap labor. Why, labor is worth what it will do—what it is sufficient for.

I think when you take the ordinary efficiency of the Filipino at 30 or 40 cents' quality, and a dollar's worth of such labor will not accomplish more in the sugar field than the dollar a day labor in Louisiana or a dollar's worth of the dollar and a half or two dollars a day labor in the sugar-beet fields of Michigan.

Then the beet-sugar people have given us some statement of the cost of their sugar. I do not suppose they went to work to find out the cost of the factory that did the least business and let that enter into the general average of the cost. Why, there were three factories in Michigan that had to move out of the State. It was stated last January that they had to move out because they could not get the farmers to raise beets. That was the excuse given. But it was latterly found out that they moved out because the farmers could not raise beets on the land of that locality. It was what they called "stump land," where there had been pine forests; and they found they could not raise beets on that land, and these factories moved out. One of them has gone to Minnesota. Now, in making up the price of the sugar I suppose that what these factories had been doing was taken into consideration at the time they moved away, and that increased the general average of the cost of the production of sugar in Michigan. According to the statement of those gentlemen who came before us last January, they stated that in 1903—because the campaign is from 1903 to 1904—it cost them $4.68½ a hundred pounds.

In 1904 they had reduced it to $4 a hundred pounds, and they say that last season they reduced it to $3.90 a hundred pounds. That is granulated sugar ready for the market. That is their statement. As I stated, the Philippine sugar costs $4.13 as against $3.90, and yet these gentlemen are trembling, or pretend to be, for fear of the interference of the Filipino sugar, when they have got the price down to $3.90 a hundred pounds, or 3.9 cents a pound, for their sugar. That is their statement. In Colorado they say that this last year it cost them $3.71 a hundred pounds, or 3.7 cents a pound. Then they make the general statement that it cost as much freight on the sugar from Colorado to Michigan as the difference of 19 cents a hundred. Well, it does not cost any more to take it to the Chicago market then. They say it costs them 24 cents a hundred to take their sugar from Michigan to the Chicago market, if I remember correctly, and it costs 24 cents a hundred to take the Filipino refined sugar from the city of New York to any market outside of it, and especially to the Chicago market, and so one freight rate washes the other. You ought not to be afraid of that sort of competition.

But that is not all of it. Are there any by-products to beet sugar? Well, in Michigan they have a distillery that takes the molasses, which is good for nothing else, and distill it. Mr. Humphreys told us last winter that they got from $2 to $2.50 a ton for this molasses at the factory, just about enough, he says, to put it in a tank and run it out of the tank onto a car. That means that it costs $2 a ton to load it. Is that a fair and honest statement, Mr. Chairman? Mr. Hathaway said that they got from $2.80 a ton to $3.50 a ton, and he made no pretense that it cost all that to load the molasses into a tank on a car. They get that price at the factory, free on board. How much this amounts to I do not know. Whether the people who own the beet-sugar factory own the stock in the distillery or not I do not know, but I believe they do.

That is not all of it. I have looked into this price of alcohol to see how much that brought. Mr. Humphreys appeared as a sort of attorney for these companies, and he is a very good attorney, too—a capable man. Mr. Humphreys complained that they had to pay the Government of the United States $1,200,000 tax on the alcohol they made in a single year, which, at the rate of $1.10 a proof gallon, amounts to 1,100,000 gallons. He says it was worth from 30 to 40 cents a gallon. Well, they sold some to the Navy Department at wholesale, and the Navy Department gave 5 cents a pound for it in large quantities; and at 6.76 pounds to the gallon, that makes about 34 cents a gallon that the Navy Department paid for a large quantity, I suppose under a competitive bid.

They have not sold any to the Navy Department since, I suppose, because they are getting more elsewhere. That means 30 to 40 cents a gallon, or $330,000 to $440,000 a year, made out of the alcohol. I do not believe these shrewd business men in Michigan are giving that all away.

Mr. FORDNEY. Now, will the gentleman permit a question, please?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. FORDNEY. Is it true that the cost of $3.90 for the production of sugar in Michigan does not include the receipts for the by-products?

Mr. PAYNE. They did not claim that there was a dollar received for the by-product on the pulp, and they complained about the alcohol and said it cost as much to load the molasses as they got for it—$2 or $2.50 a ton—a statement which I do not believe and to which I except.

Mr. FORDNEY. Now, will the gentleman permit one other question?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. FORDNEY. Is it not true that they said that $3.90 cost did not include the wear and tear or depreciation of the plant?

Mr. PAYNE. They did.

Mr. FORDNEY. Or the interest on the investment?

Mr. PAYNE. They did say that, and they say that in the Philippine Islands; they say that in New Orleans; they say that in Michigan; they say it in Colorado; they have said it in Utah; they say it universally. Whether it includes dividends or not, I do not know.

Mr. FORDNEY. Now, pardon one more remark. Will you please state whether or not if this bill becomes a law the twelve nations that are parties to the Brussels agreement would countervail against that?

Mr. PAYNE. I will come to that.

Mr. FORDNEY. Some time ago you were at that point and I wanted to ask you the question and you declined to yield at that time.

Mr. PAYNE. I will discuss that cartel business later, and if I do not I hope the gentleman will remind me of it, because I want to do it.

Mr. FORDNEY. All right.

Mr. PAYNE. Some of the Colorado people stated last spring that they were making refined sugar in Colorado at 3½ cents a pound.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. One man told me that he was making it for 3.21 a pound.

Mr. PAYNE. I think they are getting down pretty near the truth. By and by they will take into consideration all these things. What did they say about dry pulp? Why, they used to throw it all away. Then the factories put in machinery costing $67,000, and now they sell their dry pulp at $14 a ton. It used to cost them $9,800 to remove that pulp. They earn 6 per cent on the $67,000, and also an amount equal to what it cost them to remove the pulp. You see they are advancing all along the line; and now let all these fifteen factories in the State of Michigan put in dry-pulp machines and save their $9,800 or $10,000 a year, and they will reduce the price of the cost of sugar in Michigan.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the percentage of pulp to a ton of sugar?

Mr. PAYNE. I think it was stated that it was 5 pounds to the hundred pounds of beets.

Mr. LOUD. Is the gentleman from New York aware that fully 90 per cent of the pulp of beets in Michigan is waste?

Mr. PAYNE. If I did not state that, Mr. Chairman, then I want to state it now. There are only two factories in Michigan that have put in the machines.

Mr. LOUD. It is an experiment.

Mr. PAYNE. An experiment! It cost them $10,000 to remove the pulp, and to-day they put it through the machines and get enough to pay all the expenses of removal and make 6 per cent on the investment, and they call that an experiment! I would be willing to take chances in such an experiment myself.

Now, two factories have the machines, and when the other thirteen factories get them—when they get the same sum total of the sugar produced in Michigan and get credit for the $10,000 in each factory saved upon the introduction of these pulp machines—it will reduce the cost of the general price of sugar as produced at these factories.

But we are not entirely without evidence on this subject of the future of the sugar beet. Why, it is more glowing than anything that has ever been discussed about the Philippine Islands. You know we had a hearing last January before the committee. Mr. Truman G. Palmer is secretary of the American Beet Sugar Commission, and he has appeared before the committee every time. He asked for the privilege to file a brief after the hearings last month, and I gave him three or four days, but I have not been able yet to see his brief. But he came out with a circular, which was distributed last January, in which he had some interesting things to say, all of which I can not stop to read, but you will find it on page 277 of the committee hearings. There are some parts, however, that I do want to read, and while I am reading it I want you to remember this fact, that either in 1900, when we were discussing the 15 per cent duty with Porto Rico, or later, when we were discussing the change in the tariff on sugar coming from Cuba, I stated to perhaps the most expert man, certainly the first expert in the beet-sugar business of the United States, Mr. Oxnard, after a conversation with him, that I expected soon to see the day that they would produce sugar, granulated and refined beet sugar, in this country at 2 cents a pound. "Well," he said, "Mr. PAYNE, I do not know as we will hardly do that, but I expect to see it below 2½ cents." That was his estimate then. Mr. Palmer is a little more definite. In this circular sent out to the people interested in beet sugar he says:

I take it that further Philippine tariff reduction is likely to come in due course of time, but it should not come until the Philippines greatly raise their wage rate on sugar haciendas and become at least semi-civilized—

These people claim to be civilized. There are 6,000,000 members of a Christian Church—and until the brains and capital already engaged in the home industry, and which shall come to it under favorable circumstances if let alone, enable us to perfect the various improvements now under way.

Two years ago I wrote you at length concerning my suggestions of producing single-germ beet seed.

You know there are in beet seeds four or five germs in a cluster—four or five come up in a cluster—and the only way to thin them out to one is to get down on your knees and pull them out by hand. The American people do not like to get down on their knees; they do not like that kind of labor. It is expensive, and, besides, it injures the plant that is left.

The work was begun imemdiately by the Government and the first crop of seed from beets grown from 2,500 selected single-germ beet balls has just been harvested. I understand that 30 per cent of this seed came single germ and the expectation is that in four to six years more it will be an established thing, saving the farmers $6 per acre of actual labor, eliminating the hand work of thinning on hands and knees, and at least doubling the tonnage per acre—

Doubling the tonnage per acre—

Now, I hope that no one will ask me whether I really mean to say that. Mr. Palmer it is who says that. He continues:

Doubling the tonnage per acre on account of no injury being done to the remaining beets by hoeing out the superfluous ones, each plant standing 1 to 3 inches apart, depending upon how closely the seed is drilled in. If the sugar beets which the farmer now sells to the factory at an average price of $5 per ton cost him $3.50 per ton to produce, his crop grown from single-germ beet balls should not cost him to exceed $1.50 a ton.

This is Mr. Palmer who is to-day the secretary of the American Beet Sugar Association—probably the best informed man on this subject next to Mr. Oxnard.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAYNE. No; I can not be interrupted now. I desire to have Mr. Palmer heard without interruption.

The Government has taken charge of the scientific work on one of our sugar-beet seed farms in the State of Washington, and expects to be able to produce a strain of seed as high in sugar content as the best beets selected at the outset, which is 25 to 28 per cent. These mother beets should give factory beets of 23 per cent sugar, and, with a loss in extraction of 3 per cent, would enable the factory to turn out 400 pounds of granulated sugar per ton of beets. According to the Government report on the home-sugar industry for 1902, the average amount of sugar extracted per ton of beets was 221 pounds; hence this anticipated extra production of 170 pounds would nearly cut in two the present factory cost of producing sugar from American-grown beets.

Doctor Wiley, chief of the Bureau of Chemistry, Department of Agriculture, is to experiment this coming month with sugar "concrete," and, if successful, each factory, by increasing its investment 25 per cent, can operate three near-by "concrete" plants, shipping in the "concrete" to the main factory after the local campaign has been concluded and thus operating the year through and quadrupling its product, which would greatly lessen the cost of production.

Now, I don't know whether the doctor has got through with his experiment or not. I presume my friend from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] can tell.

Experiments are being made this year with an invention designed to remove the impurities of the juice at the outset instead of from the waste molasses after coming down through all the various processes, the inventor claiming that it will reduce the cost of a beet-sugar plant by 50 per cent, the labor to operate it by 33⅓ per cent, yield an average excess of 20 pounds of sugar per ton of beets, besides saving several valuable by-products.

All these matters lead to an eventual cost of production of granulated sugar from American-grown beets of something like 2 cents per pound, but it takes not only money and brains to perfect these improvements, but it takes time.

I desire to say right here in passing that these gentlemen claim that they were obliged to sell their crop 10 cents a hundred below the price of refined cane sugar simply because the sugar trust compelled them to do so. They could supply the market for only six months at a time, and the sugar trust would not supply the other six months unless they consented to take off 10 cents a hundred on their price, so that their price in Michigan this year averaged, he said, $4.15 a hundred.

We can offer the Philippine Islands a perpetual market for nearly $200,000,000 worth of purely tropical products annually. But whatever magnitude their sugar industry may reach, those who put their money into it will some day be compelled to fight a battle royal with the educated, scientific American farmer which will be costly for both and ruinous for one. Never in the history of the world has the nervous energy of the Temperate Zone succumbed to the listless workers of the Tropics, and it remains to be seen whether or not the sugar industry is to furnish the exception. Wise legislation would render such a battle unnecessary and with profit to all concerned. Unwise legislation will surely precipitate it and bring want and sacrifices to both.

And so on and so forth. It is a very interesting pamphlet, and I hope that everyone will read it.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. I wish to inquire to whom that rosy circular of Mr. Palmer's was addressed? Was it not addressed to gentlemen whom he wanted to interest in the beet-sugar business?

Mr. PAYNE. It was not. It was addressed to the sugar-beet people. He asked them to communicate with their Members of Congress. He asked the forty or fifty thousand beet-sugar farmers to see to it that no man came to Congress that dared to vote his opinions on this matter and do justice to the Filipino people. Oh, no; it was a general rally addressed to the sugar-beet interests all over this country. If the gentleman had read the pamphlet I do not think he would have asked the question, and if he reads it he will see that my reply is perfectly conclusive.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, Mr. Chairman, I have read it, and I understand it is addressed, as that kind of a rosy and extravagant thing naturally would be addressed, to gentlemen whom Mr. Palmer desires to become interested in the beet-sugar business.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not see how my friend can say that, even with the new zeal that is given to him. I challenge any man in the House to read it and confirm what the gentleman has said. The whole scope of it shows that it is addressed to these beet-sugar people, and they are asked to threaten this House by petitions, telegrams, letters, and what not, and then to carry the matter to the polls if we do not obey the dictates of these gentlemen. Now, that is the circular, and how in the world could a man expect to interest capital in that way? I am telling what deadly peril there is about to come because of the obtuseness and obstinacy of the Congress of the United States in doing our plain duty for the people of the Philippine Islands. Do people interest capitalists in that way? I hardly think you will believe that. Now, they are afraid that this Philippine sugar industry is going to grow. Well, the beet-sugar production in 1901 was 163,000 tons. In 1902 it was 195,000 tons, in 1903 it was 208,000 tons, in 1904 it was 209,000 tons, and this year 220,000 tons.

Now, that is where the brains and the capital of the American people come in in developing this industry in the United States. They have been to work at it for fifteen years and more, and from the beginning of it fifteen years ago up until now they have got up to a production of 220,000 tons. We have abundant land in the United States, there is abundant capital and abundant brains to go into the business and still these people are afraid of the Filipino—weak brother that he is, a man like a child, with the intellect of a child of the age of 12 years. These people are afraid that they will get at it without capital and without draft animals and increase this sugar production down there until it equals all that we import from foreign countries and all that we import from Cuba and supply our entire demand of 3,000,000 tons and drive them out of business!

Mr. Palmer does not fear that, because with training and capital and work they are going to get down to 2 cents a pound for the product of sugar, somewhere near the figure I fixed in conversation with Mr. Oxnard when he admitted 2½; and I believe they are a mighty sight nearer 2½ cents a pound to-day than any of them are willing to admit, if they make a fair estimate of the sale of the by-products, and they might be nearer still if they put in this improvement, which, as my friend from Michigan says, has proven a success in saving $10,000 a year in these Michigan factories. They are liable to go on in the same direction. Oh, let them advance; let them spend less time coming down here to Congress and more time in perfecting their industries. Some of them admit this thing is sure to come. Mr. Palmer says it is sure to come, but he did not want it to come just yet.

Mr. LOUD. If the farmers received 2.31 for the beets, how can they get down to the price you suggest?

Mr. PAYNE. You mean for the sugar in the beets?

Mr. LOUD. How could they afford to sell it at 2 cents for the finished product?

Mr. PAYNE. I wish my friend had heard all I said. I read what Mr. Palmer said on the subject. Produce a single germ seed; save $5 an acre for labor; double the amount of acreage, etc. It is all pointed out; it is his argument.

Mr. LOUD. But the farmer gets 2.31 now.

Mr. PAYNE. I know, but he says the farmer can produce a double amount of beet sugar on the same acreage for a less amount of work, and then, of course, he can sell for less.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman wait until I answer this question?

Mr. HULL. Well, it is just on the same line and——

Mr. PAYNE. If he can make more money, of course he will sell.

Mr. HULL. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if there is not a large profit in beet pulp?

Mr. PAYNE. I went over that very thoroughly.

Mr. HULL. The point I want to make is this, that it is not simply the sugar they get, but it is the profit on the pulp as well.

Mr. PAYNE. And the molasses. Now, I come to a discussion of this Brussels convention business. Mr. Hathaway came to us with this convention business and he almost lost his breath. He thought it was going to take us off our feet. Well, we had some knowledge of this business before we knew Mr. Hathaway. He spoke of the beet-sugar convention at Brussels and what they had done, the treaty that they had signed, or the agreement they had signed, etc. The gravamen, the weight of it, was this, that if we dared take off this duty on sugar coming from the Philippine Islands the parties to this convention would put a countervailing duty on Philippine Island sugar equal to half the differential, or 50 cents a hundred. Let us see. The duty is 1.29 on their best sugar a pound. Now, a half dollar deducted would leave 79 cents, and they would put a surtax of 39½ cents, one-half the excess, upon Filipino sugar, and under those circumstances the Filipino sugar would all come to the United States.

I think they all united in the dire prediction that it would destroy the Filipino industry and also destroy the beet-sugar produstion. This was one reason why Mr. Hathaway did not invest his millions of dollars, because he went over to Hongkong and talked to a sugar expert there, and the Hongkong refiner told him that he was afraid of this countervailing duty, and if he bought Philippine sugar he could not send it to England; just as he told the Filipino in order to work down the price on the Filipino. Most all of it went to China. He distributed to China all the refined sugar China used, and it is stated that the Chinaman had got a little too high-toned to eat the old unrefined sugar he had been feasting on for so many years; that it is not as good even as decayed fish, but he demands now the pure article and is buying refined sugar at the refineries at Hongkong; but it was stated that this was going to close the door at Hongkong for Filipino sugar, and the ports of all the nations of the earth would be closed to it. Of course Hongkong was not bound by this agreement, or China or Japan or any other of those countries where they sell the largest part of the exported Filipino sugar, but it was stated it was going to have that effect.

Then they sent to New York and got Mr. Willett, of Willett & Gray. I do not know but that if Mr. Willett sits down and figures out a thing, and has the time in which to do it, he can figure it out pretty nearly right. He stated this subject of the convention better than any man they produced, but I think he made some woeful blunders with his statistics in other matters, as I will show hereafter. He interprets the convention, but I am not going to weary you by reading it. He says:

The high contracting parties agree to impose a special duty on the importation into their respective territories of sugars from countries that grant bounties, either on production or export—which duties shall not be less than the amount of the bounty, direct or indirect, granted in the country of origin, reserving the option to prohibit the importation of bounty sugars.

Figure it out how by removing a duty on sugar coming from any part of the United States to another we grant a bounty! And further:

Now, he says:

I will give you an illustration of their application.

Mexico, up to March, 1904, assessed a duty of 15 cents per kilogram Mexican money, equal to $3.39 per 100 pounds United States money. Mexico for many years produced less sugar than it consumed, but in 1903 it reached the point where it produced more sugar than it consumed. Looking for an outlet for this extra production, they were confronted with the Brussels convention, which interpreted their import duty of $3.39 per 100 pounds as an excess of $2.89 above the about 50-cent maximum limit of the convention. One half of this—$1.45—was called surplus surtax and the other half—$1.45—was called bounty.

Mexico simply put an import tax on sugar coming into the country, something that we have always done. He says the convention put this surtax on it. Why do not they put it on us now? We have been offending all the time. But it is not offending to take the tariff off of sugar coming from the Philippines into the States, but is it not offending if you put a duty of 1.65 cents or 1.68½ cents on sugar coming into the United States if it is an offense in Mexico to put a duty of 3.39 cents on it?

Mr. MONDELL. Is it not true that if the United States was an exporting country, if we exported sugar to nations signatory to the Brussels convention, and still retained our high duty they would charge a surtax against our exports?

Mr. PAYNE. The Philippines do.

Mr. MONDELL. If our exports amounted to any considerable amount?

Mr. PAYNE. We do export from the Philippine Islands. We export refined sugar from this country. Have we got to give up our sugar bounty because of this Brussels convention?

Mr. MONDELL. Is it not the invariable rule under the regulations of the Brussels convention to charge the surtax against any country that exports and has an import duty of above one-half cent per pound?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not think it is.

Mr. MONDELL. That is what I understand to be the effect of the action of the convention. If it is not true, I have failed to understand the action they have taken. They have not countervailed up to this time, because we have not as yet given the Philippines over half a cent reduction in duty.

Mr. PAYNE. He further says:

This example shows clearly the application to any other country. The import duty on sugars into the Philippines is 73 cents per 100 pounds, which is 20 cents per 100 pounds surtax, less the 2 cents per 100 pounds charged on the exportation of sugar from the islands, say 18 cents per 100 pounds. Under the ruling of the convention one-half of this amount, say 9 cents per 100 pounds, is excess surtax, and the other half, 9 cents per 100 pounds, is bounty, but the permanent commission, in their discretion, have recently decided that the Philippines have a permissible surtax and no bounty. Their decision reads as follows:

"Regarding the Philippines there exists a surtax, but the commission has decided that this surtax can not be construed to mean a bounty for raw or refined sugar."

Well, they have considered the question in the United States and in Mexico. I do not understand that they are charging any surtax against Mexico now. True, they reduced the duty in Mexico, but it is still 52 cents a hundred pounds. It is just over the line. We have a way of regulating our own affairs. We have a way of putting on such duty as we please. We are an independent nation here. They do not put on a surtax against a pound of sugar that comes from any part of the territory belonging to the United States. But the question about the Philippines was in regard to the duty on sugar coming into the islands according to this man, and he is right about it, and not the question about the sugar coming from the islands to the United States. Why do they not insist upon putting a surtax on Porto Rican sugar? It does not all come to the United States, although most of it does. We have remitted the whole of the duty, 1.68½ for 96 degree sugar. Why do they not do it? And it was of this bogie and the other question about continuing the integrity of the personnel of our Government in the Philippine Islands which staggered Mr. Hathaway and kept back his millions of dollars. What he himself saw in the Philippine Islands concerning the production of sugar and what he heard about it was undoubtedly the real reason, and it is the reason that will keep American capital out of the Philippine Islands.

If, according to the statement of Mr. Palmer, there are millions upon millions in it in the United States, when those brainy people from the Northwest, the Temperate Zone—American brain in which I glory—and American capital shall come to a hand-to-hand conflict with our little brown brother in the Philippine Islands for the possession of the sugar market of the United States they will have a sure advantage over him.

So much for Mr. Willett on this particular branch of the question.

Now, I did not want Mr. Willett to go away and lay awake nights over this convention business, and so I thought I would put a little evidence in right in the midst of what he was saying, and I read a dispatch received from our minister to Belgium, Mr. Wilson, dated the 31st day of October, 1905, to the Secretary of State, as follows:

Permanent sugar commission sitting at Brussels suppressed compensating duty on sugars imported from Philippine Islands until new examination of Philippine regulations is made in conjunction with the legislation of the United States of America, Cuba, and Porto Rico. Question believed to be definitely settled as regards Philippine sugar.

That is the whole dispatch. From what I have read I have no more doubt that this question is entirely settled than that under the convention there does not exist the slightest reason for action against the United States because we dare to have sugar come from one part of the United States to another part without the payment of duty. The thing is absurd.

Now, we heard it stated often that when we made a concession to Cuba the Cuban planter would not get the difference, but the sugar trust would, and some sugar men came before the committee last January and quoted from Willett & Gray, showing that the price in New York of Cuban sugar was that day 19 cents a hundred less than the corresponding price of Hamburg sugar, and went away triumphantly, "We told you so." "Why," I said, "gentlemen, we have access to Willett & Gray's circular. See what it was for the whole period—the year before the Cuban treaty went into effect, on December 27, and the year after." I got the figures. They are printed in the hearings of last spring, and gentlemen will find them there. They showed what? That when the bulk of the West Indian sugar came in the market price in the United States was lower than the Hamburg price.

That was so before the Cuban treaty went into effect for a year, and that was so after the Cuban treaty went into effect for a year. The variation was about the same, and the sensible conclusion was that when there was a large amount of sugar coming into the market of the United States the buyer held off and the seller could not afford to pay the interest and warehouse charges, and therefore the buyer squeezed him to lower prices. Then, when Mr. Willett brought in his figures last month for eleven months of 1905, he shows about the same variation that there was the year before the treaty. Right along there was about the same variation, showing conclusively that the reduction of 20 per cent did not make any difference.

Then I thought I would look into the official records of the sugar going into consumption in the United States. The principal item of sugar introduced into the United States from Cuba for the fiscal year ending June 30 last was 1,744,013,316 pounds of 95° sugar. That entered at a price of 3.1 cents a pound, $3.10 a hundred. There was introduced of the same degree in 1905 other sugars, mainly from West India, 3,000,000 pounds and a fraction, at 2.4 cents a pound instead of 3.1 a pound. Cuban sugar was worth seven-tenths of a cent more in the New York markets.

It looks as though Cuban sugar was a little better sugar than the other West Indian sugars. Then recollect that the duty is to be counted, two-thirds of which they say goes to the trusts. You see it simply is not true. The figures show it. I had a little curiosity to see how these figures came out, so I took Willett & Gray's circular and got the average price of 96° sugar, which is the sugar for which they give the price for the year ending June 30 at $4.55 a hundred, duty paid. The same way with the other sugars—Cuba $4.42 a hundred and other cane sugars $4.05. So when we compare the figures of the official report with those of the renowned Willett & Gray, who appear in opposition to all this legislation, I have no doubt but what Cuba gets the benefit of that 20 per cent reduction. But Mr. Willett contends that that 20 per cent reduction has had a wonderful effect in stimulating the amount of sugar produced in the island of Cuba. He came before the committee with an estimate of the sugar imported from the other countries and the sugar produced in the United States, and stated that this year we must buy only 300,000 tons of sugar, paying the full duty, to meet our consumption of sugar. Well, when I heard him say that the consumption of sugar estimated for this year was 2,667,000 tons I was a little curious. I knew the sugar consumed in this country was 2,765,000 tons last year, and how it could be 100,000 tons less this year I could not figure out.

He admitted that sugar consumption was increasing, and had been for several years, at the rate of 9 or 10 per cent per annum, but he had taken last year, he said, because that was definite, and made it the estimate of this year. Now, if he had been fair, he would have said that the estimate this year should be rated at 3,000,000 tons, but he did not do it. Then he estimated the importation from Cuba this year at 1,300,000 tons. Well, I thought I would look that thing up. Last year the importation from Cuba was 1,139,000 tons. I did look it up, and I found that we had accurate statistics for ten months of this last calendar year, and the two calendar years preceding, for ten months. I found that the importation from Cuba for the ten months in 1904 exceeded the importation for ten months of 1905 by 164,000 tons. Then I looked to see how much the importation of sugar was for November and December 1903 and 1904, and I found that it was somewhere about 50,000 tons for each year. Well, I added about 60,000 tons to the figures for the ten months for the year 1905 and found on that basis the importation of sugar into the United States from Cuba for the last year was less than a million tons, as against his figures of 1,300,000 tons. Oh, I tell you, these figure experts, or expert figurers, on sugar can show you some remarkable footings.

Well, I looked that over to see how much more we are importing at full duty, because it is more than we were importing the year before. We imported from Cuba, 1,000,000 tons; from Hawaii, 370,000 tons—I took Mr. Willett's estimate of 370,000 tons, which I think is too high—from Porto Rico, 210,000 tons; cane sugar produced in the United States, 300,000 tons; beet sugar produced in the United States, 265,000 tons; 39,000 tons of Philippine Island sugar, which is now in bonded warehouses in New York. Whether it will go into consumption or not, I do not know. These figures added make 2,184,000 tons. This subtracted from the 3,000,000 tons that we consume leaves 816,000 tons imported into the United States at the full rate of duty. Why, when we were trying to pass and did pass through the House the bill to get reciprocity with Cuba, I was told that it would immediately send down the price of sugar to the consumers in the United States, and some of these very sugar men have been howling, trying to make capital out of the fact that it did not reduce the price of sugar in the United States. I believed that it would not, and it has not. I believed that the exporters of the sugar would get the difference, and they have. I believed that it would not hurt a single sugar industry in the United States, and it has not.

But they say we had in contemplation a hundred or more factories, and we have only built six. We would have built more, but the thing was so uncertain, and we did not know what you would do with the Philippine Island sugar, and all that sort of thing.

Well, I propose to give these gentlemen certainty. Let us write it into the statute book. We will have 25 per cent of duty until April 11, 1909, and then we will have the free importation of sugar from the Philippine Islands, so that you will not have to complain hereafter about knowing where you are at or what you are to do in the future.

I believe, as I have always believed and have told these gentlemen, that if the thing was definitely settled and they knew what the law was there would not be any trouble about developing the industry, but as long as it hung in the balance and the thing was agitated people would be frightened. They themselves have frightened people in trying to prevent this legislation.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Why not consider it as definitely settled now?

Mr. PAYNE. It never will be definitely settled until it is settled right. We have no right morally, we have no right in carrying out our constitutional prerogatives, to charge these people duty except for the mere purpose of revenue for themselves. We have no right to protect one part of the United States against another part, and gentlemen representing the tobacco interests and representing the sugar interests have so expressed themselves before the Committee on Ways and Means in this debate. The only thing they have claimed to say was that we have not definitely concluded that we were going to stay forever in the Philippine Islands. We are there now and there is no prospect of getting away for the next twenty-five years, in the anticipation of the most sanguine man. Are we going to treat them in this manner for twenty-five years because we have not definitely decided what our children will do twenty-five years from now?

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman from New York permit a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. FORDNEY. I understood the gentleman to say a minute ago that in the Cuban reciprocity he contended that it would not hurt the beet-sugar industry. Let me say to the gentleman that in the State of Michigan there are four factories that went into the hands of the sugar trust, and that they have been shut down and torn down. One of them cost $800,000, and within ninety days from the time the trust obtained title to it they had 150 men on the factory razooing it to the ground.

Mr. PAYNE. Yes; I understand that. I am glad the gentleman has made the admission, because the sugar people who came before the committee stated that they did not know whether the trust owned any stock or not, but there was a gentleman who was acting as trustee and who had bought stock and appeared in the board of directors, and possibly he might be a representative of the sugar trust, and he had bought some of these factories. He says that four factories have been closed down. I know of three, and I know why they closed down.

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not think the gentleman does.

Mr. PAYNE. I know what they say. They say it is because they built the sugar factories out where they had to raise the sugar beets, among the pine stumps or on the pine-stump land, and they could not raise them.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, the gentleman has reference to the Oscoda factory. Let me say that I do not know whether the trust owns the factories or not——

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman, then, is in the same state of ignorance that Mr. Humphrey and Mr. Hathaway were.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. It has been stated that it was able to control the price of the product.

Mr. PAYNE. Yes; but I do not think it is worth while quibbling about it. Probably it was the man in the moon who invested and not the sugar trust. I do not care who it is. I heard one gentleman say that he thought he had been buncoed. He was led a year or two ago to vote against Cuban reciprocity, and the first thing he knew the beet-sugar people were selling out to the trust and he was helping the trust all the time. They owned a part of the stock then and he did not feel right about it. I did vote for it, and I have no sympathy with him. The best way is to vote right, and the right side of this question is to do the just thing by all the people of the United States, the Filipinos, and the beet-sugar people and the cane-sugar people, and if we vote this bill we will do exactly the right thing. [Applause.]

Now, they say they are afraid they are going to overslaugh us with sugar. The consumption of sugar has increased in this country from 1,949,000 tons in 1894 to 2,767,000 tons in 1904. The imports from Cuba increased from 43,000 tons in 1895 to 1,151,000 tons in 1904. That is an increase of 42 per cent in consumption, and an increase in the Cuban product of 36 per cent. If you take it this year the increase in consumption is from 1,900,000 tons to 3,000,000 tons, an increase of 37 per cent, and the product from Cuba from 843,000 tons in 1895 to 1,000,000 tons in 1905, an increase of 16 per cent.

In Hawaii there has been a big increase from 1895 to 1904. In 1895 it was 129,000 tons, and in 1904 it was 330,000 tons. They have got clear beyond their limit, and lots of these estates do not pay to operate them. They are having a hard time to get laborers; they want the Chinese-exclusion act repealed; they want to let in cooly labor, peons, or anybody else. I do not know what other gentlemen told them, but I told them that so far as I could resist it, I would do so, and that they might calculate to go on with their sugar estates without the benefit of cooly labor.

Now, as to Porto Rico, I did not have the statistics back of 1901. Then it was 66,000 tons, and in 1904 it was 116,000 tons, an increase of 75 per cent. They were pretty well established in the sugar business when we took them in. I know one Englishman who came here weeping for the poor Porto Rican with the 15 per cent Dingley rate, and I was told that he was a millionaire sugar producer there. I told him about it, and he never bothered me about it after that. Now, in the Philippine Islands the largest production they have ever made was 300,000 tons. They consume 80,000 tons in the islands.

They exported that year 220,000 tons. That is the biggest thing they ever did. That is when they had most of their 400,000 acres under cultivation. Census year (1903) they had 180,000 acres under cultivation, and they produced 180,000 tons of sugar, and still these people will claim that they have been producing 2 and 3 tons of sugar per acre, and find some plantation where they had done it, and they say that represents the average of the islands, when the census shows 180,000 acres actually under cultivation and 180,000 tons of sugar for that year. Then they go back and say that was a half crop and say that some other years they had 300,000 tons. So they had, but they had more acres under cultivation. They may sometimes produce an average of a ton and a quarter to an acre down there, according to the calculation made by Secretary Taft. On one estate he figured up a ton an acre. Some one looked over his figures and said that it showed a ton and a quarter an acre. I think it was a ton and a quarter myself, I think there was a mistake in the figuring, and certainly I do not think Secretary Taft meant to deceive anybody. There it is, a ton and a quarter an acre, sometimes, but are they going to have such a growth of this industry that they will produce from 4 to 6 tons an acre down there? Now, what moonshine! What is the use of talking like that. They can not do it.

The history of these other countries show that they can not do it. Here is Hawaii, with free sugar against the duty of 1.68½ on 96 degree sugar, having that advantage, claiming that they can make but 2.7 per cent on their investment, and that many do not make a dollar on their investment. There is some difference between Hawaii and the Philippine Islands. It seems to be in favor of Hawaii. They have less rainfall—50 inches a year instead of 150 inches a year—and they can work the ground better, they can work machinery better, they can work steam plows better. Yet with all these advantages the average is a little over two tons an acre in the Hawaiian Islands. They say we do not get all the juice in the Philippine Islands. Of course they do not. With their three roller mills they get about 50 per cent. The best factories in Louisiana get 85 and 88 per cent. They may get the mills down there some day to do that. We will not get them down there before Mr. Palmer's five years are up, in which he is to produce 2-cent granulated refined sugar in this country. He is not afraid. Give him three years' time in energy in the Temperate Zone against the people of a tropical zone. He is not afraid. He need not be afraid. He told his honest convictions when he said that there is no danger to him, and there is no danger to his industry.

But I am taking too long. I did not intend to talk so long, Mr. Chairman, and I shall say very little about tobacco. Now, of all the scares and ghosts and goblins in the world, the worst is the scare that has been worked up among the tobacco people—telegrams going out from Washington to telegraph your Member that if he votes for this bill—H. R. No. 3—he will put us in competition with the Chinese cheap labor in Manila. There are twenty-eight Chinamen under the census, and they are all that could be found in the Philippine Islands who are making cigars. Think of it! Twenty-eight Chinamen out of nearly 12,000 cigar makers. Competition with the cooly laborer in the Philippine Islands! Well, now, of course that is a fraud upon these people. The only protests I have received from my district—and we have cigar factories there, for we raise tobacco there, and we have a beet-sugar factory there—was from one of my constituents, who said in a letter the other day—he is a cigar maker—that if I did not defeat this bill it would bring him and his fellow-workers in competition with Chinese cheap labor in Manila. Well, I think there are some Chinese factories there, but they are little bits of fellows, such as we have in little towns, who have two or three men working for them. The big factories are owned generally by the Filipinos. There are some eleven Americans in the cigar business there, some Chinamen, one negro, and the rest are Filipinos. The big factories with two or three thousand hands are owned by Filipinos and run by Filipinos.

I am not going to go at length into the tobacco business. Why, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] has run it down and back and forth, and he has received from the cigar makers themselves and the cigar manufacturers figures that are startling in confutation of every representation made before our committee. These come from manufacturers and workmen. The cigar makers need not be afraid of the cigar makers in the Philippine Islands. The competition will be from the cigars made by the Williams process by machinery—made at a less cost per thousand than they can make them by hand. Now, tobacco costs as much in the Philippine Islands as it does in the United States. New York tobacco sells for 10 cents a pound; Virginia tobacco for 6 or 7 cents a pound. How much is it, I will ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES]?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I do not know.

Mr. PAYNE. I think 6 or 7 cents. That is exported. I do not want to disparage the products of the gentleman's State, but it is stuff that is fit only for chewing tobacco and plug and smoking tobacco, and then large portions of it only fit to send to Germany or some other foreign country. Connecticut leaves sell for 30 or 40 cents a pound. We raise some Connecticut leaf up in my district. Well, the wrapper tobacco of the Philippine Islands is worth 35 cents a pound according to the statement of this gentleman. Let us see.

This was submitted by Mr. Bijur before our committee when he appeared. Price of domestic cigar leaf, he puts it—he does not say whether wrapper or filler—New England, 21.6; New York, 10; Pennsylvania, 9; Ohio, Miami Valley, 7½; Wisconsin, 7.8; Georgia and Florida, 28.8. There is a little item of interest in the statement made before the committee. In Georgia and Florida they have gone into the experiment of raising tobacco under shade or cover. They have imported the Sumatra seed. They have succeeded in making a leaf equal to the Sumatra tobacco, some of them claim; some say nearly equal. Of course Sumatra tobacco costs from a dollar to a dollar and a half a pound, with a dollar and eighty-five cents duty. They are producing this Sumatra leaf down there ready for the trade at a cost of 80 cents a pound for leaf wrapper tobacco—thin, nice, perfect leaf, like the Sumatra—to wrap American cigars with. We have got it naturalized—American tobacco in Florida and Georgia. Well, they put it down here in this statement at 28 cents a pound. Now, they give here market price for Filipino leaf tobacco per quintal—that is, 101.44 pounds—from the Daily Bulletin, Manila, December 12, 1904. Isabela, 1901, first to fifth class—these statistics go back quite a ways. They are furnished by Mr. Bijur before wages went up.

It would have been a better average if it was brought down to now, but we want to convict him out of his own mouth. They put in first class at $42; that is, 42 cents a pound, as against 21 cents in New England and 28 in Georgia and Florida, and they have not any tobacco that compares with the wrapper leaf in Georgia and Florida or with the wrapper leaf in Connecticut, and yet these people are howling for protection. Why, they say that even with the 9 cents duty on tobacco for the next three years this is going to ruin their business. Men come down here and some of them go over to see brother HILL, and he brings in his exhibits and the statement that he has, and they go back and say, "It is not so much of a scare after all" and "I think you are right about it," but still this agitation is kept up. Isabela is the best tobacco. Then there is the Cagayan, which is not as good. This is 1901 quotation. First to fifth class, $11 to $38, which is 38 cents a pound, or 37 cents with a hundred and one pounds and a fraction to the quintal.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is that price in gold or silver?

Mr. PAYNE. That is in gold; good old American dollars. Isabela, 1902—this is for another year—first to fifth class, sixteen to thirty-six dollars a quintal; Cagayan, 1902, first to fifth class, ten to thirty-two dollars. Brill, that is a poor quality, first class, few stocks offered—they do not have much first class—thirteen fifty a quintal; second class, $11; third class, nine fifty. None of it gets down to the farmers' price in Virginia, or Ohio, or Wisconsin, or in Pennsylvania. That is what is costs there in Manila while they are trying to persuade the tobacco farmers of this country this bill is going to ruin them, and they are just as earnest in trying to persuade the sugar men.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Has the gentleman received any protests from the tobacco growers of Tennessee or Kentucky?

Mr. PAYNE. According to my recollection, not a word. There are none up to this time, to my recollection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to say to the gentleman that although there is an immense territory in both of those States where they do not raise anything except tobacco I have not received a single protest, and I have inquired of a number of leading tobacco farmers and they all say that this tobacco will not conflict with the Tennessee and Kentucky tobacco, which is practically the same as Virginia.

Mr. PAYNE. They are level-headed men.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Of course they are.

Mr. PAYNE. I thought I would have to testify to it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am glad the gentleman has so quickly and promptly stated the whole truth.

Mr. PAYNE. Export leaf Filipino tobacco, wrapper, per pound, 30 cents; filler, 10 cents; smoking tobacco, 7.5 cents. Mr. Shuster, collector of internal revenue, discovered afterwards he had made a mistake about the tobacco and changed it, but we will let it go at that. Mr. Bijur says what the value of the United States cigar tobacco ready for the market "should be." Why did not he tell us what it is? "Should be!" Why, there is a wonderful chance of explanation of the words "should be" and a play of the imagination. What a wonderful chance for the poet! New England, 35; New York, 18; Pennsylvania, 21; Ohio, 21; Wisconsin, 21; Georgia, ——; Florida, 80. Well, in my country they raise tobacco. A small percentage of it is suitable for wrappers. Another small percentage is suitable for binders and a part is suitable for fillers; and of course they can not sell fillers for 6, 7, or 8 cents a pound in the market unless they get as much as 20 cents or 21 cents a pound for the wrappers, which is a small proportion of it, and sell the whole crop on the farm at the uniform price of 10 cents a pound. Now, here is the showing by the man who was put forward to represent this interest, trying to show that he is going to injure the tobacco farmer in the United States.

And then they got up another scarecrow. The duty on Sumatra leaf coming into the islands is 23 cents; coming into the United States is $1.85. They said: "Why, your bill will allow that Sumatra leaf to come in and be made up into cigars and sold in the United States and only pay a duty of 23 cents a pound." Why, gentlemen, look at the bill. It relates wholly to the products of the Philippine Islands coming in free of duty, and whatever is imported into the United States from another country pays the Dingley duty. It is so enacted in the bill; so written in the law. Where is the danger? They say that you can not tell the difference. I said: "Do you mean to tell me, as an expert, that you can not tell the difference between Sumatra and the Isabella leaf?" "Well, we might tell it, but the custom-house officer might be deceived." "But the custom-house officer has the inspection of the leaf that goes into the factory. We can follow it from the beginning to the end, until it goes into the market or goes out of the Philippine Islands. There is no chance for a fraud. If your prediction is right, Congress is here and we will see to it in the future that that tobacco pays $1.85 before it goes into the islands rather than to have it come in in fraud."

The rice men of Louisiana have been, within two or three days, protesting. We have forced onto the people in that country a duty on rice which is a protective duty. Representatives from that section all voted against it; but the Republican party vote and legislate for the whole people of the United States, and the rain and the sunshine and Republican rule fall alike upon the good and upon the evil. Now, they are raising all of the rice that is consumed in the United States, and they are thanking God that He induced the Republican party to give them that duty on rice. Well, they have been told that if rice came in free from the Philippine Islands, although they imported $7,000,000 worth last year and will probably import three and one-half and four million dollars this year to supply their own wants and to feed their people, it will destroy this industry here. Those people in Louisiana—the people who raise rice there that is so magnificent—who own those large plateaus of land surrounded by dikes, inundated just at the right time—rice planted not in the water, as in the eastern country, but planted when the land is comparatively dry, and where they use the plow and other tools and plant the crop and then turn on the water until the rice is matured, doing so much of it by machinery—will soon be in a position to sell the rice against any rice anywhere in all the world; but they are afraid of the carabao and the Philippine plow—a sharp stick and a little piece of iron on the end, driven through the water, because the rice paddies have to be inundated when the rains fall from heaven—and they fall mightly copiously in the rice-planting season—they plow the land under water, set the rice under water, wade through it so laboriously in the hot sun—yet the people of the South are afraid of those people sending rice to the United States and flooding this country and driving the owners of the rich soil down in Louisiana and Texas out of the business.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Are they going to continue to use those primitive methods?

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman asked me if they are going to continue to use those primitive appliances.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Under Republican administration.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, the Filipinos are a progressive people. The gentleman is getting a glimmering that will raise him up immeasurably in his political ideas if he will only follow it.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I will suggest to the gentleman from New York that he is rapidly climbing down off of that high-tariff horse he used to ride around here.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, the gentleman may see something in that. Did I ever advocate a duty on sugar and protect the sugar producer in New York against Kansas, Pennsylvania, or Michigan, or against tobacco?

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Did you not advocate a measure creating a tariff duty of 75 per cent of the Dingley rates against the protest of the majority of the membership of the other side of the aisle?

Mr. PAYNE. Well, the other side of the aisle, as usual, was wrong. [Laughter on the Republican side.] They wanted to deprive the Philippine people of any revenue. I protested against it. I know more now than I did then. I thought 75 per cent would produce more revenue than a lower duty. It did not. Twenty-five per cent may, but we have got to get a duty of some kind to give a little revenue, because the march of progress is going on and we do not propose to halt in the work of educating those people, especially in the industrial arts, if the whole Democratic party, great and small, all wings flopping together, are against it. We are going to take care of that. [Loud applause on the Republican side.] The Japanese, progressive people as they are, are raising rice the same way that they raised it a thousand years ago. It seems to be a certain sort of necessity of that climate and the nature of the rainfall there. They have got to get a flood from heaven as the rains fall, so they construct their rice paddies to hold the rain, and when the rain comes it comes too soon, and they have got to get the carabaos to wade the water to run their plows. They are not able to get mules to do it. They die. They are not able to use steam plows. The paddies are small. They are generally small. They do not take in a hundred or a thousand or more acres, as they do in Texas. Providence has not dealt so generously with these people in regard to rice as it has with the people of Texas and Louisiana. I hope that with improved methods they can do better. I hope that you people in Texas and Louisiana, when you are able to furnish rice at half the cost that you are furnishing it to-day, will not drive the Philippine people out of their rice paddies. I hope the time will come when they will be able to feed their own people down there.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Has it fallen under your observation that these Filipinos raise a superior kind of rice and export it and then import an inferior quality from somewhere else and live on that themselves?

Mr. PAYNE. It has not.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The reason I ask that question is because I received a letter or circular from somewhere down in Texas stating that that is exactly the condition of affairs.

Mr. PAYNE. I shall look for the official report and find out. I hope the gentleman will do it before he commences his speech.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman from New York will permit me, I would venture to say for the benefit of the gentleman from Missouri that if the Filipinos have been guilty of that performance—that they exported good rice—they first imported it, for they certainly have not raised any of it up to this time.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have detained the committee much longer than I expected. I want to say a word more about a Filipino who appeared before the committee at Manila and here, Mr. E. de la Rama. He is a man of about 36 years of age, a splendid specimen of manhood, educated in Paris, who speaks French, Spanish, and United States—perhaps I should say English—with great facility. He is a little short of English when he gets into the excitement of a speech. He is a natural orator, a sugar raiser, a plain farmer, and still a bright and interesting man. When he appeared before the committee the other day, he closed his address with these words:

> Before closing I wish to inform the committee of the last recommendation which I received before leaving the islands from our people. I was asked to say to the lawmakers in the national capital that it may be possible that we may be mistaken in some statements which we make, and that it might be possible for us to invade the market in the United States; but it may also be that we may have some reason for not doing so, and it may also be possible that the opponents of this bill may make statements which may be correct or not. This, nevertheless, is a very important matter. It is a question on one side of the prosperity and the felicity of a country under the American flag, while on the other side of the ruin and continual misery of the same country. We believe that the matter is of sufficient importance, so that an effort should be made by practice to show who is in the right. If, after some length of time of practice or practical application, it should be found that we have been mistaken, and that we really can only prejudice instead of benefiting this country, we ask ourselves in such case, Is there any power which could prevent Congress from reestablishing the tariff? Then, in such case, we would not oppose the measure, because, although we are a barbarous people, we have sufficient intelligence to understand that charity begins at home.

I commend that to the gentlemen representing the beet-sugar interest and the cigar interest and the tobacco interest of the United States, and ask them to get up on the plane of this "half civilized," this "barbarian" Filipino, Señor de la Rama, and remember with him that charity begins at home. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BONYNGE. Will the gentleman yield for a few questions? I did not interrupt him during his remarks.

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. BONYNGE. What is the acreage in the Hawaiian Islands cultivated in sugar?

Mr. PAYNE. I have not those figures here.

Mr. BONYNGE. How much sugar did the gentleman say was raised per acre in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. PAYNE. The census showed a ton per acre. The estimates of the sugar planters showed that some years it was one and a quarter tons per acre. There are 400,000 acres that have been in cultivation, although they sometimes do not cultivate them in sugar. There was 200,000 acres last year. Generally they do not have a rattoon crop. They do not have a crop two years in succession. There is usually some other crop raised in between; so that while there have been 400,000 acres in cultivation it has not been all at the same time.

Mr. BONYNGE. Was there testimony before your committee of cases where as much as two or three tons were raised per acre?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes; just as there has been shown another instance where as much as eleven tons were raised in one place in Hawaii.

Mr. BONYNGE. I will ask the gentleman if this land adapted to sugar culture amounted to 9 per cent of the 73,000,000 acres of lands?

Mr. PAYNE. The census reports say 9 per cent is arable.

Mr. BONYNGE. And one-half of those lands are uncultivated at the present time.

Mr. PAYNE. Not quite one-half; 4.4 per cent, to be accurate.

Mr. BONYNGE. If put into sugar cultivation they could raise on those islands something over 4,000,000 tons, then, could they not, even at a ton per acre?

Mr. PAYNE. If it was all put under cultivation and they could raise sugar on all of it, a ton per acre might mean that; but a large portion of those lands is not suitable for sugar.

They are more suitable for abaca, for the hemp business; they are more suitable for cocoa; they are more suitable for tobacco and for grazing. So that I take it, from what I can learn, that about the same proportion of sugar lands could be found in the remaining 4.4 per cent as have been found in the 4.6 already under cultivation.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. As I remember it, there are 1,500,000 under rice cultivation.

Mr. PAYNE. I forgot about the rice.

Mr. BONYNGE. I am talking about the 4,000,000 acres which are not under cultivation at all, but that are available to be put under cultivation.

Mr. PAYNE. I think about the same percentage as the present percentage would be available for sugar cultivation if it was extended to this land.

Mr. BONYNGE. Now, on another subject I should like to ask the gentleman. Do I understand him to argue that the United States Government has no moral right to levy this tax, except for the purpose of revenue?

Mr. PAYNE. I think I did state that.

Mr. BONYNGE. Has that always been the view of the gentleman?

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I do not know whether it has or not.

Mr. BONYNGE. When you discussed the Porto Rican question in the House, did you not argue that we should levy the tax against the Porto Rican sugar for the purpose of setting the precedent to the Philippine Islands, that their products should not come into the United States free of duty?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know. That was a pretty good speech, and if the gentleman has read it, it is probably all right. If he has not read it, he will find it good reading now.

Mr. BONYNGE. That is your view now.

Mr. PAYNE. It may be that I took that position at that time. The whole theory of the Porto Rican bill was to fix such a percentage of taxation as would replenish their treasury; and further, the most important thing I had in my mind—although I was remonstrated with in high quarters for presenting it—was that we should establish the relation of those islands to the United States, to know "where we were at," and what we should do in the future, what the law was, whether the Constitution went there or not to prevent Congress from legislating as it pleased.

Mr. BONYNGE. Also, incidentally, was it not your view then that we should levy that tax for the purpose of establishing this precedent that the Philippine products should not come into the United States free of duty?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not remember any such thing. If I said it, it will appear in the RECORD, because I never change what I say.

Mr. BONYNGE. I will call the gentleman's attention to that later. Now, do I understand the gentleman to argue that there will be no benefit to the Filipinos by this reduction of duty?

Mr. PAYNE. I am doubtful about the benefit to the Filipinos.

Mr. BONYNGE. What is the purpose of the bill, then?

Mr. PAYNE. Why, to reduce taxation in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. BONYNGE. Regardless of whether it benefits the Filipinos or not?

Mr. PAYNE. Well, it will benefit them in this way: It will give them courage. There is some sentiment in it. They believe it will help them. They say the present law is unjust, and I think it is. I want to do justice by them. Then if it does not benefit them it is not my fault, but the decree of Providence in creating those islands and in locating them and in not so fixing them that they can raise sugar to advantage. It may be the position of the American sugar producer in the United States, who has got so far along that nobody can touch him.

Mr. BONYNGE. So that it is more from the sentimental standpoint than from the economic standpoint?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, no; it is because it is right. Does not the gentleman appreciate that? Because it is right between them and us. That is the reason.

Mr. BONYNGE. When the gentleman argued the Porto Rico question I did not understand him to take that position. On the contrary, I understood from the speech of the gentleman at the time that it would be wrong to admit the products of oriental countries into this country free of duty and to put the labor of the United States into competition with the cheap labor of the Orient. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. I commend that speech to the gentleman.

Mr. ALEXANDER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman spoke several times in regard to the peculiar labor conditions that existed in the islands, and I wish he would explain at length what those conditions are.

Mr. PAYNE. The Filipino laborer has not been educated up to the plane of labor in the United States. His wants are not so many. He can get along without a hat, and, in rare instances, without a shirt and without pants. His wants are few; he has not the incentive to work that men have in this temperate climate, and yet I was glad to see generally that they were wearing hats and shirts and pants and even a frock. They are advancing in that respect. They do not require as much to eat. There are a number of tropical fruits they can eat that do not require to be cooked; they live very well on rice, and they have not been ambitious about the beauty of their homes. These are built there of the nipa grass and of the cogan grass, with bamboo poles. A man builds his own house himself. It does not require a great deal of labor to build it. When you go there and advance wages by the month they get tired out at the end of two days or at the end of the first week and want a holiday; they have a great many holidays. They are gradually being lifted out of that rut. They have not the incentive to lay up money. They have no savings banks in the islands; they do not know what it is to have money in the bank, and yet I was told that one of the banks at Manila had started a savings deposit, and in an incredibly short space of time they had a great many depositors, and a deposit of a considerable amount from laborers. They are learning these things, and as they learn them they demand greater wages. They insist on larger wages. A cigar manufacturer in Manila told me he was afraid of free trade because it will advance the wages of the cigar makers.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Now, if the gentleman from New York will pardon me, a question right there. The gentleman stated that the Spaniards paid 20 cents for labor in the navy-yard and that we were paying 65 cents a day. Has labor improved in the same ratio?

Mr. PAYNE. I understand it has improved, but I can not say whether it has improved in the same ratio or not, but the cost of living has increased nearly double they say.

Mr. PERKINS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. When the gentleman considers the difference in the intelligence of the laborer and the difference in the efficiency and industry of the laborer, does he think that the sugar raiser in the Philippines gets any more work for a dollar than the sugar raiser in Michigan?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not, and I so state in the report.

Mr. PERKINS. I so understand.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from New York permit a question on another line?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. MANN. As I understand the bill, if a manufacturer of alcohol or tobacco in the Philippines sends his product here into this country free of duty he pays here the internal-revenue tax, and that is transmitted to the Philippine Government?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think that is a dangerous precedent?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not think so. If they send their products into the market here, they ought to pay the same tax and have the same rights——

Mr. MANN. Yes, but they do not have the same right; they have a better right.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, the gentleman is quarreling with the fact that we collect the internal-revenue tax and transmit it to the other government?

Mr. MANN. We collect the internal-revenue tax and turn it over to them. I understand that has been the policy in the collection of the custom duties, but that came through special circumstances at the time. This is a permanent policy. If the Government once adopts it, and should it be necessary, we may have to do the same thing with the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says no, but we can not treat the Philippine Islands on any better terms than we treat the Hawaiian Islands. They are complaining now that we collect money and do not turn it over to them. Now, we adopt the policy of government under which they can manufacture alcohol and tobacco in the Philippine Islands, pay nothing there and then come here and collect the internal-revenue tax and transmit it to them. Why should it not be the same principle with the States? Why should the Philippines have better advantages in the long run, permanently, than any other Territory, or the States of the Union? I am asking for information.

Mr. PAYNE. These islands came to us after three hundred years or more of Spanish rule and Spanish misrule.

The people were robbed by the officials. The industries, many of them, some of the time were prostrated under the heavy taxation that was laid. The question of governing those islands and of getting the expenses was a question that was thought over very carefully in the Porto Rican case. In that case I had introduced a bill for free trade, as the gentleman will remember, and then I came across General Davis, who was the governor-general, and questioned him upon the subject in the presence of the Secretary of War. I asked him how he was going to pay the revenue. Well, he said that they could get some out of the internal-revenue tax, that they made 1,100,000 gallons of rum. I asked him then what it sold for, and he said from 20 to 40 cents a gallon at retail. Then I said, "If we add $1.10 to that, will the people stand it?" He said, "No," and in reply to my question as to what they would do he said there would be riot and bloodshed down there among those peaceable people; that we could not collect it now; that after a time we could, but that we can not do it now. In other words, we had that burden upon us and we would have to take care of them. I have thought it better to collect these taxes and turn them over to the treasury and give those people an idea that they were doing something toward raising the revenues of their government; that they were paying these taxes and that we were supporting their government upon taxes paid by them and our commerce with them and give them in that way a more independent feeling. I do not want them to get the feeling that we are giving merely as a matter of charity, making appropriations from year to year, but I want to bring out the manhood of these people. I want them to feel that they are men, responsible to this Government for the upbuilding of these islands and for the aid of the Republic of the United States.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman has that feeling—and I know he has, and he knows that I have always supported him in these matters—would it not be wise to insert in that provision of the bill a time limit, so that Congress reserves to itself the determination of the policy in the future, and not forever make these people feel that they are dependent upon the National Treasury for their support without help from themselves? Of course I understand that Congress has that power of reserve anyway.

Mr. PAYNE. I will say to the gentleman that I hope when this period arrives—this 11th day of April, 1909—they will be in such a position that we can extend our revenue laws to them, so far as the custom duties are concerned, the same as to the Porto Rican islands, upon the commerce with the rest of the world, and increase their internal-revenue tax—I do not think we can make it as much as ours—and that the revenues would be sufficient to turn the other back into our Treasury without stopping the progress of education, which I deem so essential. Now, the gentleman does not want to put anything in the way of education——

Mr. MANN. But why not add a limitation so that then Congress can stop if it wishes to, and not be in the position where we could be called by them "robbers" if we take away from them that which belongs to us, which does not belong to them?

Mr. PAYNE. I think the gentleman is unduly apprehensive.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the question of my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], reference to the bill which we have under consideration will show that this act is purely amendatory of the act of March 8, 1902, which is described in the title as an act temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes, and we reserve the right in the act to make that legislation simply three years.

Mr. PAYNE. We have that right anyway.

Mr. MANN. I understand that to be the case, of course, and that this is the law now. But now if they bring in these articles they must pay the customs duty upon them, and here is a position which may mislead them——

Mr. PAYNE. No; the gentleman is wrong about that. It has been held that they do not have to pay our internal-revenue taxes when they bring them in here.

Mr. MANN. But the customs duty?

Mr. PAYNE. The internal revenue.

Mr. MANN. But they pay the customs duty. They pay the customs duty.

Mr. PAYNE. But they do not have to pay the internal revenue.

Mr. MANN. They pay the customs duty and then the internal-revenue tax on it.

Mr. PAYNE. I was of that opinion until I was brought up on it in the committee by a gentleman who stated differently.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman now say——

Mr. PAYNE. Under the present law they do not.

Mr. MANN. Under the present law, if they bring a gallon of alcohol from the Philippine Islands, all they have to pay is the customs duty on that?

Mr. PAYNE. That is right.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman is mistaken. In addition to that they are required to pay the internal-revenue tax. The customs duty is practically nothing.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, we had the opinion of the Attorney-General, and they do not exact that.

Mr. MANN. I still think the gentleman is wrong.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] has the same recollection.

Mr. MANN. I have seen a whole committee under an impression and still seen them wrong. [Applause.] Because if that be the case we would all be in the Philippines manufacturing alcohol, because the cost of manufacture and the customs duty together would not amount to one-half the internal-revenue tax in this country, but now you propose to change——

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken; the cost of the customs is larger than that of the internal revenue.

Mr. MANN. I think the chairman of the committee is wrong about that. When alcohol is brought into this country——

Mr. PAYNE. I want to suggest to my friend it is so easily settled by looking at the law that we can not get closer than by——

Mr. MANN. That is true, but, whatever may be the law, here is a proposition to change the customs duty. Now, if it is proposed to pay over internal-revenue taxes to these people, it seems to me that the only proper way to do is to make a time limitation, so that Congress at the end of the time, if it wishes to give this charity to these people again, can do so; but they will not have the right to feel they are entitled to it.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I do not think we are going to have much trouble in their insisting upon their rights, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I have not been here as long as the gentleman from New York, but he has been here long enough to know that a law that is made as a charity is hard to change. Here is a case now. Because we gave the sugar raisers of Colorado and a few other States what they called a right, but what is partly a charity, they can not find language enough to denounce you now when you propose to insist upon some rights for the rest of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. PAYNE. I yield, but I would remind my friend that I would like to bring this discussion to a close, as I have been on my feet for three hours and three-quarters already.

Mr. LLOYD. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that Hawaii is seeking legislation at the present time to have all the customs duties turned over to the Hawaiian government?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, yes; and the gentleman knows there is no more prospect of their getting it than there is to get the balance in the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. LLOYD. I beg your pardon; I have no such knowledge.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I think I know it.

Mr. LLOYD. You may know more about it than I do, but I know such legislation is sought and is pressed with earnestness and with some degree of merit it would seem. These people down there claim at the present time we are taking all their revenues from them, and we are leaving them in an impoverished condition, and they are unable under the present system to meet their present financial needs, and it is a very serious proposition to them, and so they are coming and demanding legislation.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not think it is very serious when you tell them we are spending a great portion of it in appropriations, that we will soon be spending more for the benefit of the harbors of those islands, and that the Territories of the United States get no such appropriations from the Treasury because they have no harbors and they have to support their own government, and they have to have imported articles which are duty paid when they come into their territory. Hawaii has nothing to complain of.

Mr. LLOYD. That does not relieve the situation, because we have information from what seems to be a reliable source that there will be no river and harbor bill probably during this session and probably not during this Congress, so that any needs they may have in that particular direction will not be granted by the Government.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 99. An act to aid the Council City and Solomon River Railroad Company.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] does not like to go on to-night, and I do not feel like urging him. I have imposed myself so long upon the House that I think they are tired of me.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I do not expect to make a very long speech, but I could not finish this side of 5 o'clock, and I really would rather speak in the morning. I would take it as a great kindness if I could be allowed to do so.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, the committee has been so indulgent to me I do not insist upon going on now, and, therefore, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLMSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee had had under consideration House bill No. 3, the Philippine tariff bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PORTO RICO.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 5, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Commitee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill No. 3, to amend an act entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," approved March 8, 1902.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York permit me to move to discharge the Committee on Immigration from the consideration of a privileged resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask that the same be now adopted?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] yield?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not yield.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, it will only take a minute or so to do this.

Mr. PAYNE. I understand that it is a resolution reported adversely by the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is mistaken. It is not that resolution. This resolution I now ask to have considered is a privileged inquiry calling on the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to send to this House copies of three reports heretofore made by Special Immigrant Inspector Marcus Braun, of New York City, in 1904 and 1905, regarding immigration between Austria-Hungary and the United States.

Mr. PAYNE. Has it been reported by any committee?

Mr. SULZER. This resolution is now privileged under the rules, because it was introduced more than a week ago, and the committee has not reported it or acted upon it. It was introduced by me on the 13th day of December.

Mr. DALZELL. What committee?

Mr. SULZER. The Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Mr. PAYNE. I think I will insist on my motion.

Mr. SULZER. Very well, I will call it up again.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] declines to yield. The question is on the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill No. 3.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. OLMSTED in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3—the Philippine tariff bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, we all listened yesterday with a great deal of interest, pleasure, and instruction to the very elaborate speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. If I were certain that every Member of the House had either heard that speech or had read it, I would feel that any remarks at all explaining this Philippine tariff bill would be superfluous. Since this House developed from a deliberative assembly into a business body, what the Members want is facts more than rhetoric. That speech of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee was replete from end to end with instructive facts. Shakespeare says:

> To gild refined gold, to paint the lily,
> To throw a perfume on the violet,
> To smooth the ice, or add another hue
> Unto the rainbow, or with taper-light
> To seek the beauteous eye of heaven to garnish,
> Is wasteful and ridiculous excess.

I say in perfect soberness that so far as information is concerned in favor of the bill it is almost impossible to improve it. In thinking of his speech I am reminded of the incident wherein a man offered a prize to two negroes, each one to name the three best things on earth to eat. They went into the contest, and the first one named "Watermelons, possum, and sweet potatoes." The other one said: "Gosh, boss, I won't play, 'cause he has named all there is." [Laughter.]

But for fear some Member did not hear or read it, I shall state a few pertinent facts here to-day.

There has been a vast amount of talk about the productive capacity of the Philippine Islands; also about their area. I will confess I never was more astonished in my life, except when a Republican beat me for Congress in 1894 [laughter], than I was when I found out how small the area of the Philippine Islands really is. Probably every Member of the House that has not investigated the matter will be surprised. According to the figures of the Philippine agricultural bureau, the total area of the archipelago is 73,000,000 acres, of which 50,000,000 are forests and mountain lands practically worthless for agricultural purposes, and of the remaining 23,000,000 only 3,200,000 acres are cultivated in crops, as follows: Sugar, 180,000; rice, 1,600,000; tobacco, 80,000; sweet potatoes, 60,000; plantains, 85,000; hemp, 550,000; cocoanuts, 375,000; corn, 267,000.

In this country we are in the habit of talking about square miles instead of acres. The area of the Philippine Islands is 78,128⅛ square miles only. The State of Missouri contains 69,415 square miles. The ground that can be cultivated, according to the most liberal estimate, in the Philippine Islands is 35,937½ square miles, just about the size of that portion of the State of Missouri south of the Missouri River.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], who is an expert in figures, says that there never have been cultivated more than 12 per cent of the Japanese islands. Twelve per cent of this Philippine cultivation, if it can be done, will be 12 per cent of 35,000 square miles, which makes a piece of land just about the size of six good counties in Indiana or Missouri. You could easily place the entire 78,128⅛ square miles in the Congressional district of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS]. In the light of cold facts, to these pigmy proportions shrinks our oriental empire, which has cost so much and about which certain misguided enthusiasts have boasted so extravagantly.

In the beginning of these remarks I wish to state what the Democratic position is. The majority of the Republicans of the Ways and Means Committee, under the lead of the chairman, who introduced the bill, propose to reduce the Dingley tariff rates on tobacco and sugar imported into the United States from the Philippine Islands—wholly the product thereof, from 75 per cent, where they now stand, to 25 per cent of the same, and we are to have the same provision for our products into the Philippine Islands until the 11th day of April, 1909. That is the day of the expiration of the treaty with Spain. But after the 11th of April, 1909, the Ways and Means Committee bill, the majority bill, provides there shall be free trade with those islands. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], the Democratic leader and ranking Democratic member of the Ways and Means Committee, introduced a substitute providing for immediate free trade with the Philippine Islands. I do not think I am violating any of the secrets of the committee when I say that that substitute was voted down. Then we voted against reporting this bill simply because they would not vote for our substitute. We filed a minority report, a very short one, of which I will read every word, and which seems to cover the entire subject:

> The undersigned members of the minority of the committee believe that the anomalous and preposterous status of the Philippine Islands, by which they are treated as American territory for certain purposes and as foreign or semiforeign territory for certain other purposes, can not be long maintained and should be immediately terminated.
> At present, according to the whim of Congress or the Executive, they are considered as American or foreign, or as both American and foreign, or as neither American nor foreign.
> In justice to both the Filipinos and ourselves they should be considered as altogether American or altogether foreign.
> So long as we retain them we favor the establishment and maintenance of free trade betwixt them and the United States.
> The party, which we in part represent, desires to get rid of them at the earliest practicable moment, and we welcome the dissatisfaction of the hitherto legislatively favored classes, growing out of the competition of the products of Philippine labor with our own products in our own market as a possible moving cause to governmental divorce between the Philippine Archipelago and the balance of the United States.
> For these reasons we offer as a substitute for H. R. 3 H. R. 406, which is in words and figures as follows:
> "A bill to secure to the Philippine Islands free trade with the balance of the domain of the United States.
> "Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the date of the passage of this act all goods, wares, merchandise, or other articles, being the growth or product of any of the islands forming a part of the archipelago called the Philippines, or of the island of Guam, when shipped to any port of Hawaii, Porto Rico, or to any other port of the United States, shall enter any said port free of import duty.
> "SEC. 2. That from and after the passage of this act all goods, wares, merchandise, and other articles, being the growth or product of Porto Rico, Hawaii, or any other appurtenance, Territory, or State of the domain of the United States, when shipped to any port of the Philippines or Guam shall enter any said port free of import duty.
> "SEC. 3. That all existing provisions of law enacted by the Congress, by the Philippine Commission, or by any other authority whatsoever, civil or military, which are in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to repeal the provisions of a treaty of peace entered into at Paris, France, on the 10th day of December, 1898, by and between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of Spain, and confirmed by the Senate of the United States on the 6th day of February, 1899."
> If the substitute herein proposed is voted down we will support H. R. 3, being the bill reported by the majority, on the principle that it is a long step in the logical and right direction.
> JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS.
> CHAMP CLARK.
> WM. BOURKE COCKRAN.
> OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD.
> D. L. D. GRANGER.

> I have been in the Philippine Islands about three months (too many), and as I see them they are a bunch of trouble on the horizon of civilization. They are bounded on the north by rocks and destruction, on the east by typhoons and hurricanes, on the south by cannibals and earthquakes, on the west by sharks and smugglers.
> The interior of the island is composed of mud and mountains. The population includes 80,000 carabaos (water buffaloes) and 8,000,000 roosters. Of the people 80,000 are insurrectos, 80,000 are amigos (friends at the muzzle of a .44), and the balance are Chinese gamblers and carineta drivers.
> The Philippine Islands are a nice bouquet for a deadly enemy. The climate is pleasant and healthy for mosquitoes, ants, lizards, bats, scorpions, snakes, and carabaos.
> Malarial fever is so prevalent that on many occasions the islands have shaken by the vibration of the inhabitants in their chills.
> To let you know the varieties of diseases the men of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps have to contend with, with slum and beans as "chow," I will name some of the simpler, such as beri beri, smallpox, leprosy, adobi itch, bubonic plague, cholera, all of which are guaranteed to give satisfaction.
> The natives are very industrious, their chief industries being cockfighting and stealing. Their marriage ceremony is very impressive, especially that clause in the contract which provides for the wife the privilege of laboring for her husband as much as he desires. The home dress of the Filipino is artistic and attractive, consisting of transparent and primitive outlines. The native costume is flour sacks tied around the body (Harris Brothers' brands being preferred); children under 15 years of age wait until the next year for clothes.

The towns are aggregations of shacks full of fleas, cur dogs, cats, horses, pigs, chickens, carabaos, bedbugs, and the families, all living on terms of equality.

The Philippine Islands as a whole are a forsaken, cannibalized, Aguinaldo-infested blot on the earth—at least the marine thinks so when he has thirty long months to stay here.

Do I like it? Guess.

The whole controversy divides itself into two branches—tobacco and sugar. There is nothing else in dispute.

I am going to leave tobacco entirely to my friend from Connecticut, Mr. HILL, and my other friend from Ohio, General GROSVENOR, who are indefatigable in the collection of facts, who possess marvelous memories, with great power of observation, and who have visited the islands, investigating the matter on the spot. For years General GROSVENOR has borne the honorable title of "Old Figgers." Mr. HILL has earned the sobriquet of "Young Figgers," with which I now invest him. He will illustrate his speech by a set of samples of tobacco as remarkable as any drummer ever carried to his patrons. [Laughter.] I will say this, however, that from my youth up I have been familiar with tobacco and tobacco raising, both in Kentucky and Missouri. As a boy on a rocky farm in the hill country of Kentucky I burned the plant beds, sowed the seed, set out the plants—awfully hard work—hoed tobacco, plowed it, wormed it, suckered it, cut it, hung it up to dry, stripped it, made it into hands, pressed it into hogsheads, hauled it to market with ox teams, and smoked some of it. [Laughter.]

Kentucky, Missouri, Texas, and Tennessee can raise not only this country's supply of tobacco, but the world's supply; but the trouble about it is that the land is so rich that it produces such a heavy tobacco that it is not rated as the finest kind for cigar wrappers, which is the highest-priced variety. But to show what scientific cultivation will do, a few years ago in Lincoln County, in my district, a man raised tobacco that sold in the leaf for a dollar and a quarter a pound. In that district there are 200 brick houses and a hundred brick barns on the farms, equal in architectural beauty to the executive offices now occupied by the President of the United States. [Laughter.] Every one of those magnificent farmhouses and barns was the result of tobacco grown during the civil war at the high prices then prevailing. The day will come when, by scientific farming, we will raise as fine tobacco as grows on the face of the earth, every ounce that we need for American consumption, and then export some, and God speed the day. [Applause.]

As to this sugar question, it is interminable in its ramifications; the literature on the subject forms a large library; but there are a few salient facts that stand out in bold relief. Habit, if not nature, has made sugar a prime necessity among civilized peoples. The sugar habit is of modern contraction, but it is now confirmed and incurable. Nearly all sugar consumed is refined sugar, but it is easier to talk about it in the raw state. Sugar is not refined to any appreciable extent in the Tropics. The average consumption of raw sugar in the world is 10,000,000 tons annually. Sometimes it drops a little below those figures; sometimes it rises a little above them. The world's production of sugar is the same. This last year it happened there were 11,973,000 tons of raw sugar produced in the world; 7,865,000 tons of beet sugar; 4,908,000 tons of cane sugar. Of this quantity of sugar we consumed in the United States in 1904—the last year for which we have complete figures—2,767,162 tons, our per capita consumption being about 72 pounds per annum. In "the United States proper"—God save the mark!—we produced only 585,000 tons—265,000 beet sugar; 320,000 tons of cane sugar. From "the United States improper" [laughter]—that is, Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the Philippines—in 1904 we imported 409,270 tons. From foreign countries in 1904 we imported 1,798,381 tons. The average Hamburg price—which is the world's price—of raw sugar is 2 cents per pound. Now you have it in a nutshell. In 1904 we imported from the Philippines 25,489 tons only. Now, understand, the cane-sugar raisers and the beet-sugar raisers all think this bill is going to ruin them. Why, gentlemen, the Philippine sugar is not a drop in the bucket. The greatest quantity of sugar that was ever exported from the Philippine Islands in one year was 256,852 tons. That was just before the Spanish war broke out. That was in 1893. They consume at home about 80,000 tons annually. The total exports fell to 82,043 tons in 1904. Who is to blame for that, I am not going to stop to inquire now. Suppose it goes back to where it was at its maximum—that is, 256,852 tons for export. Even then they will export, all told, only about one-eighth of the amount of sugar that we must import. Does any man in his senses believe that the importation of that amount of sugar from the Philippine Islands, even if we imported every pound of it, will reduce the price of beet sugar in the estimation of a hair? If he does, he has a great deal more credulity than I have. But we will import only a small portion of it, free trade or no free trade, for China, with over 500,000,000 people, is their close neighbor, and Japan, with fifty-odd millions of people, is at their very doors, being less than a hundred miles distant. One of the amazing bits of evidence before the committee was that the Chinese are just learning to eat sugar. Why they did not contract the sugar habit two or three hundred years ago is what Lord Dundreary would denominate "one of those things no fellow can find out." The poor, benighted Chinese will never know what they have missed. But they are taking to sugar eating with a relish, so Secretary Taft says. If they all cultivate the saccharine appetite, how much Philippine sugar do you imagine will ever gladden the palates of the American people?

Some of you gentlemen are acquainted with the game called draw poker, one feature of which is to raise your opponent. I never saw anything in my life that reminded me so much of that game as the way the witnesses swore before the Ways and Means Committee as to the amount of sugar that could be raised in the Philippine Islands. I do not blame them for being interested in it. A man that does not work for his own interests in this world, and the interests of his people, is not worth his salt. Our duties in this House divide themselves into two great classes. One of them is to legislate for and look after the interests of the country in general, and the other is to legislate for and look after the interests of the people we represent on this floor in particular. I do not blame the sugar men, but I want to state some facts for their information. They come in and estimate that there are so many acres of arable land in the Philippines, and that you can raise so much sugar to the acre. Why, it is like raising ducks; you can take a sheet of paper and a pencil and start in with one drake and two ducks and figure yourself into a multimillionaire before you go to bed. [Laughter.] I have in my eye now a distinguished Republican statesman who lies awake at night inviting insomnia by pestering his head to cipher out how quick he can become a Crœsus by raising turkeys. [Laughter.] And as the best turkeys on the face of the earth are raised in my district, I extend to him my encouragement and felicitations. One woman in my district refused $500 for a gobbler [laughter] on which she took the premium at the Louisiana Purchase Exposition. If my Congressional friend can start in with that sort of a gobbler and raise that grade of turkeys, in less than fifteen years Rockefeller's and Carnegie's fortunes rolled into one would pale into utter insignificance beside the amount of money that he will make in raising turkeys. [Laughter.]

The way these lightning calculators figure it out is this. The sugar men and the tobacco men assume that there are so many acres of arable land in the Philippines. The sugar men come in and assume that every acre of that land is to be planted in sugar. Then they draw on their imagination to the effect that the Americans will go thither by the hundred thousand to raise sugar, and that they will introduce American modern methods, and they will raise 8 tons of sugar to the acre. Now, the facts show that a ton of sugar to the acre is a pretty good average crop in the Philippine Islands, and facts are stubborn things—much more reliable than the imagination as the basis for mathematical demonstration. When our sugar friends get through ciphering, the Philippine Islands are not only going to raise all the sugar that we can consume, but all that all the nations of the earth can consume. The tobacco men then take their turn, and plant the same identical land in tobacco [laughter], every acre of it, and when they get through every fellow in this country and in the civilized world has a ton of tobacco for his own use.

I want to ask you a question for consideration. What are these Filipinos going to do for something to eat while they are planting every arable acre they have to tobacco and sugar? They can not live on sugar; they can't live on tobacco. The truth is, gentlemen, that this bill is not going to increase perceptibly the acreage planted there of either sugar or tobacco, and I will tell you why. Because an acre of hemp there pays three or four times in cash as much as an acre of tobacco or an acre of sugar. They have a monopoly of hemp; nature gave it to them; nobody can take it away from them, and the supply is not near equal to the demand. Inevitably, therefore, every acre of land that can be planted in hemp will be subtracted from the sugar and tobacco areas and devoted to hemp.

Now, as to the beet-sugar men. I have it not in my heart to say an unkind word to them; I am very fond of them. They are my friends, and they treat me royally when I go up to Michigan; but they are not in a strictly prime condition to raise any objection about the importation of sugar from the Philippine Islands. [Laughter.] I will tell you when was the time to raise this question about the importation of sugar into the United States from tropical countries free of duties. They are just seven years too late. They are performing the condemned caper of locking the barn after the horse is gone. The time to have set their thinkers to operating rapidly was in the summer of 1898, when we were annexing the Sandwich Islands, when some of us stood up here and fought the Hawaiian grab tooth and nail—fought it, among other reasons, because it would bring American labor into direct competition with the cheap Chinese and Japanese cooly labor of those islands; fought it courageously, wisely, patriotically, amid the ceaseless villification of hundreds of newspapers subsidized for that very purpose. But in spite of all we could do, Hawaii was annexed, and our labor has been brought into competition with Chinese and Japanese cheap labor—more's the pity. It gives me no pleasure to say, "I told you so." On the contrary, it gives me much sorrow. Where were the beet-sugar patriots then? How fought they on that occasion, which was the Quatre Bras preceding Waterloo? Every man jack of them lined up for annexation. Did they think that they could eat their cake and keep it, too? Did they not realize the possibilities of sugar production in Hawaii then? If they did know, are they not estopped from complaining now, when they think that the evil of which they were forwarned is upon them? Surely they can not set up the poor plea of ignorance, because it is writen, "Ignorantia neminem excusat," and because they were told over and over again what would happen. That was the golden opportunity of the beet-sugar men. They let it pass unimproved; aye, more, they aided mightily to force it to pass by. "The mill will never grind again with the water that has passed."

If the beet-sugar men had lined up with us then against Hawaiian annexation there would have been no Hawaiian question about sugar; no Porto Rican question; no Philippine question about sugar to vex them now. That was the root of the whole evil. If they want to find out what this country has lost in revenues and what they have lost in profits I will tell them very suddenly, all because of this importation of sugar from the Sandwich Islands. It is enough to make you fall off your seats in an apoplectic fit, you sugar people. From 1875 to 1905, both inclusive, we imported from the Hawaiian Islands 4,295,061 tons of sugar. Think of that! In round numbers the tariff on raw sugar is $35 a ton. As a matter of fact it is $1.685 a hundred on sugar 96 per cent pure, and then the sugar trust has in addition to that a differential rake-off on refined sugar of the difference between $1.68½ and $1.95 per hundred, and in addition to that one-eighth of 1 cent per pound flat, making the total differential on refined sugar $5.30 per ton.

At $35 a ton the Treasury of the United States has lost $150,327,135 of revenue that it might just as well have had from the Sandwich Islands. In addition to that, as an absolute gratuity under the Newlands resolution of annexation, we squandered four millions more. Hawaiian sugar is coming in here now at the rate of 400,000 tons a year. That is a gratuity of $14,000,000 that we are giving annually to the Hawaiian sugar kings, besides this $154,000,000 already paid; and, sad to say, we will pay it annually—

> Forever and forever, so long as the river flows,
> So long as the heart has passion, so long as life has woes.

That is what you are paying for your Hawaiian whistle. Don't you think that the Hawaiians come rather high? Awfully high—too high? That is what we paid and are paying to coddle them into a condition of mind to permit us to swallow them. In addition to that, Porto Rico produces 100,000 tons of sugar a year.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Certainly. I always gladly yield to my friend from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Perhaps it would be well in the making of history of the very important character that the gentleman is speaking of making to insert at that particular point that the sugar of Hawaii was coming into this country free since 1875, and that no attempt has been made by either party, when in power, to change that situation, so that in point of fact when we annexed the islands we annexed them with the running agreement and treaty binding upon us to continue a condition that was binding before.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is exactly true. It is entirely pertinent. The difference in the situation then and now is this: Prior to annexation Hawaiian sugar was coming into the United States free of tariff duty, under a treaty which either party to it might denounce at any time that it chose. Now, we are married to Hawaii by an irrevocable decree, because the average American citizen can not make up his mind to ever divorce a single foot of land to which we have even the color of title. Land lust is in the breed. It is one of our master passions. That sugar could have been got rid of by treaty. As a Democrat, in favor of tariff for revenue only, I say there never was any sense in letting the Hawaiian sugar in here free, for, as we shall see further on, letting it in free of duty never reduced the price of refined sugar to the American consumer even in the smallest degree.

In addition to letting in the Hawaiian sugar free we are also letting in Porto Rican sugar free. Last year Porto Rico produced 100,000 tons. What her maximum production will be no man knows.

Cuba raised a million tons of sugar last year and it is estimated that this coming year she will raise 1,300,000 tons, and that sugar comes in here at 20 per cent off the Dingley rates; and the reason of that is apparent to everybody. We might as well be candid. We are fixing to perform the great anaconda act of swallowing the Cuban Republic at the proper time.

I have made these remarks as to Hawaiian, Porto Rican, Cuban, and Philippine sugars not because I love our cane-sugar raisers and beet-sugar raisers less, but because I love the corn raisers, wheat raisers, and live-stock raisers more. They are my people. They have six times honored me with their commission to represent them here. No witness appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means to speak for them and other consumers of sugar. They seem to rely implicitly on the fidelity of their Representatives on this floor, and so far as in me lies they shall not be disappointed.

No human ingenuity can protect them by a tariff, for the all-sufficient reason that they are essentially and necessarily exporters. The world is their market. What they want—all they ask—is that "square deal" of which we hear so much and see so little.

Notwithstanding this immense largess which we have paid and are still paying to the Hawaiian sugar kings, they had the infinite gall to send their agent before the committee to protest against this bill. That certainly is the most stupendous exhibition of cheek seen on this earth since the devil took the Savior to the top of a high mountain and offered Him the dominion of the world to fall down and worship him.

At this point I desire to give you some deductions I made from all this investigation, and if these figures are not substantially right I shall be obliged to any gentleman who will correct me. Here is the first deduction from all the evidence: It costs little, if any, more to raise an acre of sugar cane in Louisiana than it does to raise an acre of corn in Iowa, Illinois, or Missouri. I am boring for blood. If I can not get votes out of this House, I want to go to the place where they can be had, and that is among the corn growers of the Mississippi Valley. The cane seed to plant an acre costs $12. Seed corn for an acre costs much less, $1 or so, though there is a man up in the district of my friend the gentleman from Iowa, Colonel HEPBURN, at Shenandoah, who sells seed corn all over the country at $2 a bushel. Second, the sugar land costs no more in Louisiana than corn land costs in Illinois, Iowa, or Missouri. I take these three States simply because they are in a group and constitute the heart of the corn belt. Third, the average crop of sugar cane on an acre is 20 tons, worth $3 a ton, making $60 an acre, which, with $12 off for the seed, leaves $48. Fourth, the sugar beets produced upon an acre are sometimes worth as much as $50 an acre. Beet-sugar land costs no more per acre than good corn land. That was stated in the committee. To be fair, I take that to be above the average. Fifth, 40 bushels of corn to the acre would be a large average for the corn crop all over the country. Forty cents a bushel would be a high price in the field; it will not average it. That makes $16 an acre for corn. With perhaps $1 for seed, that leaves $15 an acre. There is one man in my district this year who raised 115 bushels an acre, and corn is selling at about 46 cents in St. Louis. Of course that is an extraordinary crop per acre. Five or six years ago one man in my district, on 11 acres, raised 133 bushels and a fraction to the acre. That is extraordinary in any country. I will undertake to sell every acre of corn, on the average, that will be raised in the United States this year for $15 an acre, and grow independently rich in the transaction. Sixth, so that the beet-sugar farmer or cane-sugar former receives twice or thrice as much per acre as the corn farmer. I would like to see any living man face an audience of corn raisers advocating a tariff of 1¾ cents per pound on raw sugar and at the same time tell them truthfully that the price of their corn is the world's price. It seems to me that Republican corn raisers would wake up very suddenly and that the "stand patters" would hear something drop with a dull, sickening thud.

Seventh. If the Republican stock raisers, wheat raisers, and corn raisers in this country voted their interests as assiduously as do the beet-sugar men, instead of voting their prejudices, there would never be another Republican Congress or another Republican President in the United States, a consummation devoutedly to be wished. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But I will tell you how it is worked. The Republican grain and stock raisers vote their prejudices directly against their own interests, while the beet-sugar raisers vote their interests.

Eighth. There is a tariff of 15 cents a bushel on corn, ostensibly for the benefit of the corn raiser, but really to catch suckers. A tariff of $15 or $15,000 a bushel would do him no good, for his market—the market that fixes inexorably the price of his corn—is Europe. You could raise on one good section of land all the corn imported into this country last year.

The tariff of 25 cents per bushel on wheat does the farmer no good whatever, for there is little wheat imported and that little is imported principally for seed wheat. The result is that the American farmer's seed wheat costs him more than it otherwise would.

Ninth. The American raw-sugar producer is protected to the extent of $1.68½ per hundred, or $35 per ton—a tariff protection of about 75 per cent.

In addition to that, the sugar manufacturer has protection to the extent of $5.30 per ton of refined sugar, which makes him monarch of all he surveys from the center all around to the sea.

Tenth. And in this differential the sugar-beet men share, for they sell only refined sugar.

Eleventh. To be candid and fair to all concerned, it ought to be stated that it costs more to raise an acre of beets than an acre of either corn or sugar cane. That grows out of the fact that one beet sends up many shoots, necessitating much hand work.

I am happy to state that Mr. Secretary of Agriculture James Wilson is experimenting on a single-shoot beet, which, if he succeeds, will greatly diminish cost of raising sugar beets. All good citizens bid him a hearty Godspeed in his undertaking.

Mr. BROUSSARD. The average yield of the cane per acre in the State of Louisiana and the State of Texas is 16 tons.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That will be $48.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Then the next year there is an average yield of, say, 9 tons on the stubble, the ratoon. The third year there is no crop raised at all, while the average yield of corn is year after year, so that the average yield of cane is 16 plus 9 or 25 tons for three years, and not 20 tons a year, or 60 tons.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Gentlemen, do you know what a "ratoon" crop of sugar cane is? It is the second crop that grows from the original planting—without any planting at all except the original planting.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Will the gentleman state that the cost of growing a ratoon crop, which can not be eradicated from the soil, but grows without replanting, as he has stated—that the cost of cultivating that crop is just as much as the first crop, though producing scarcely one-half the result?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. According to the gentleman's own statement, you have 16 tons of cane the first year, $48; 9 tons the second year, $27; 48 plus 27 is 75.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Will the gentleman state the third year?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. With $12 off for seed, that leaves $63 for two years, which is $31.50 per acre for sugar cane for each of the two crops. There is not one farmer in 10,000 who gets that much for his corn. It is $21 per acre per annum for each of the three crops raised from one planting—which is more, far more—than one farmer out of 5,000 the country over receives for his corn or wheat or oats or hay.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Is it not a fact that the bill which he is supporting now, either the majority or minority proposition—it makes no difference to me; I know he signed the minority report as a member of the Ways and Means Committee—is it not a fact that there is not one pound of refined sugar produced in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is true. Sugar, it appears, can not be refined successfully in the Tropics.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Does not the gentleman know it to be a fact, that the sugar trust—the American Sugar Refining Company—thrives exclusively upon the proposition that they get raw sugar such as is produced in the Philippine Islands as a feeder for their refineries in this country?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The price of raw sugar has nothing to do with the sugar trust within certain limits. It is a very intricate mathematical business. I will explain it briefly. The world's price on raw sugar is $2 a hundred or $40 a ton, in round numbers. I do not mean it is always that, but that is about it—the average price. Hamburg is the sugar market of the world, just as Liverpool is the world's market for corn and wheat. The tariff on raw sugar is $35 a ton. Now, when the sugar trust, which is the chief buyer here, wants sugar, namely, it has to pay the world's price of sugar as fixed at Hamburg first. Then it has to pay this tariff of $35 a ton, together with freight and insurance, whenever it gets it anywhere. If there was not any differential on sugar the sugar trust would go to smash before this time next year.

Mr. BROUSSARD. The gentleman is right.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am going to finish up this differential business while I am at it.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I am with you on that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The differential is the difference between $1.95 a hundred and $1.68½ for 96° raw sugar, and then when the sugar goes down in degrees the differential goes down. That differential of 26½ cents on the average on refined sugar gives the sugar trust an absolute monopoly of the American sugar market, except as to the beet-sugar men. In addition, there is another differential of one-eighth of a cent per pound, making the whole differential 39 cents per hundredweight of refined sugar.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Except as to the beet-sugar men?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Except that. Now, wait a minute. The sugar men are the beneficiaries in this differential, because the beet-sugar man always furnishes his sugar in the shape of refined sugar and thus far competes with the trust unless it has an agreement with the trust. One of the most intelligent witnesses I have ever seen in my life was that gentleman from Michigan, Mr. Humphrey. I think a great deal of him, too. I asked him this question: "What is the reason you beet-sugar men do not fight the sugar trust?" He said, "If we had $90,000,000 of capital we would go in and fight them to a finish; but the difference is that, when we begin making sugar, we have to go on and complete it and make refined sugar, as we have not sufficient money with which to store the raw sugar, whereas the sugar trust stores this raw cane sugar and refines it whenever it pleases during any part of the year. The beet-sugar men have to make their sugar and refine it in two or three months after the beets reach the factory."

If the beet-sugar makers and the trust combine or divide territory, the only check on their absolute monopoly of our market is this: They can not put the price of refined sugar much above the world's price of raw sugar, plus freight and insurance on raw sugar from the place where it is bought, plus the tariff on raw sugar of $1.68½ per hundred, plus the cost of storage and refining, plus the differential of 39 cents per hundred on refined sugar, without letting in foreign refined sugar.

If the beet-sugar men of this House will vote to take that differential off refined sugar, I will vote against this bill or any other bill on the subject which may be brought into this House.

Mr. FORDNEY. I am with you on that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. All right; bring it on, but you will have to carry it through. [Laughter.] It won't go in on a bluff. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. BROUSSARD. I hope the gentleman will pardon me for a moment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Wait half a minute; after I finish this differential I will yield to you.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I am with you on the differential.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to refresh the memory of some of you gentlemen upon what was done here some two or three years ago. They had up a Cuban reciprocity bill here, and we added to it an amendment repealing the differential on sugar. One of the grandest sights I have witnessed since I have been in Congress was to see enough beet-sugar Republicans, led by the Marshal Ney of the beet-sugar forces, Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH, of Michigan [laughter], walk down this aisle and walk between the tellers with the Democrats to kill the sugar trust as dead as a smelt.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. In a minute. Let me tell you what else occurred on that occasion. I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] was in the chair. I would not do him an injustice on this or any other occasion. When that amendment repealing the differential was offered he ruled it was not germane to that bill, and the Republican beet-sugar men rose in their might, joined hands with us, and overruled the decision of the Chair. Now, if a proposition is made here on this bill to repeal the differential on sugar, the question of whether it is germane or not is res adjudicata. We have them nailed up on that proposition between heaven and earth, where they ought to be. [Laughter.]

Mr. DALZELL. I will ask the gentleman if instead of being res adjudicata it was not overruled within fifteen minutes of that time?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Who overruled it?

Mr. DALZELL. The same force.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me ask my friend from Pennsylvania a question. Wasn't it the Republican machine that did it? And did not the Democrats and beet-sugar Republicans run over the House Republican machine roughshod?

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, they did it. [Laughter.] But I would like to ask my friend to tell us what became of Marshal Ney? [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is a perfectly pertinent question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, if the gentleman will permit me?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Wait a minute until I get through with the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I do not know whether the Marshal Ney of Michigan is going to make a charge on this occasion or not, or whether he will be like King Joachim Murat, of Naples, during the Waterloo campaign, remain away from the field of his glory, thereby losing his crown. Now, the gentleman from Ohio. [Great laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will ask the gentleman from Missouri, who is always interesting, and just now is peculiarly and specially so, if he can give the proportion of the sugar product of the world as between the refined sugar of all foreign countries other than Cuba and the entire product of the whole world?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; I could not do that without sitting down and figuring it out, and I haven't leisure for that just now.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is it not a fact that it would be beet sugar—about two-thirds?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is true, I think.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Your proposition is to repeal the differential between refined and raw sugars?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes, sir.

Mr. GROSVENOR. For what purpose?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. For the purpose of killing the sugar trust as dead as a doornail. [Laughter and loud applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Suppose that that being so, you first killed the cane producer of Louisiana and, secondly, this force headed by Marshal Ney—the beet-sugar interests in the United States—and whether you will bring the world in competition with the refined sugar of the beet producers of the United States.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not believe it will hurt the cane-sugar grower of Louisiana or the beet-sugar grower.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If that be true, now then what benefit would it be to anybody to repeal the differential?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It will benefit the American sugar consumer, for whom I stand, because he would get his refined sugar cheaper.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is probably true now. But in the end the sugar-beet interest of the United States must inevitably be destroyed. At the present time you would repeal the differenial and you would do that in the interest of the American people, as I understand.

Mr. CLARK or Missouri. Let me make a suggestion. Cut down the differential on refined sugar to 50 per cent of what it is now, then what do you do? I will tell you what you do.

Mr. GROSVENOR. You cut down the price of beet sugar, of course.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, suppose you do. It will increase the market. It would cheapen sugar to the consumer and at the same time protect the American producer of raw sugar sufficiently. Cut the differential on refined sugar down 50 per cent. It will not lose the American sugar market to the American sugar grower, but will merely cut down the profits of the trust 50 per cent, making refined sugar cheaper to the American consumer. You can not get out of that proposition.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I am thoroughly in accord with the gentleman on the question of the differential. There are two differentials on sugar coming to this country. There is the one-eighth of a cent per pound on all sugar imported into this country ranking above 96 polariscope. Really the differential on sugars coming into this country is the difference between 96 sugars and 100 sugars, which is the difference between $1.68½ per hundred pounds and $1.95 per hundred pounds. That is one differential which is concealed. Then there is another differential, of which I have already spoken, the one-eighth of 1 cent flat per pound. So there are two differentials. I am opposed to both of them. The beet-sugar people, as I understand, may or may not be opposed to one-eighth of a cent differential; and when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] comes at the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], the gentleman from Missouri can properly say to him that when he is talking of differentials he is talking of the one-eighth of a cent per pound for refined sugar and not the difference between $1.68½ and $1.95 on sugars classing above 96 per cent polariscope.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If the gentleman will allow me, what per cent of sugar is controlled by the sugar trust?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Practically the sugar trust controls the entire American sugar market.

Mr. BROUSSARD. All of it except the sugar produced by the beet-sugar people; in fact, all that comes into this country.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I believe that raisers of American cane sugar when it is developed to its full extent and the American beet-sugar raisers can raise every pound of sugar that the American people will ever consume and export sugar besides, and I will hail that day with a great deal of pleasure. In the meantime I do not want to be paying two prices for sugar. There is another element which enters into this controversy—the question of labor. Our beet-sugar and cane-sugar friends are scared to death for fear that the Filipinos will go to work like we work in the United States. Why, gentlemen, there is no more possibility of that than there is that the sun will rise in the west to-morrow morning instead of the east. You can not induce the inhabitants of those islands or any other tropical country to work like we work here. It is not in them. Life is easy. They do not need any clothing hardly, and they pick their living off the trees. There isn't a man in this House who would work if he didn't have to work. I have been searching all my life for the man who would rather work than eat, and I haven't found him yet. He is a myth—an ignis fatuus.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to continue until he concludes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri may continue until he shall have concluded. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the House. If you could take the Filipinos by the nape of the neck, every one of them, and throw them into the sea, and then send 7,000,000 American citizens over there, and if the climate did not debilitate them, I grant you that the product of sugar from these islands would be large compared with what it is now. But the climate takes the stamina out of our breed when they go over there.

There are very few fields there that are big enough to plow with a gang or steam plow. You can not use horses or mules over there because they die. I am very sorry for that, because Missouri is the greatest producer of mules on the face of the earth. [Laughter.] I inquired particularly about what it was that killed mules and horses, and some called it the surra; I don't know whether that is a kind of glanders or not, but it doesn't make any difference; it kills them. Our cattle won't live over there. They imported Jerseys and shorthorns, and they all died in a short time. You can not import our kind of poultry and make it live. The only work animal that seems to flourish there is the carabao; I never saw one of them and I never want to. I was invited to go over there by Secretary Taft, but I could not go, though I would have enjoyed a trip in such good company. According to all the evidence in the case the carabao is the slowest moving of all four-footed animals. He stays half of his time in a mud hole, and when the time comes for him to take his mud bath, he simply lights out, as we say in this country; and my opinion is, after hearing all the evidence, that, if we should take the most energetic man we have in our country and put him to plowing with a carabao, in two years he would be as slow moving as a Filipino or a carabao. We got a "gold brick" of huge proportions when we bought the Philippines.

I believe that they can raise sugar in the Philippines a little cheaper than we can raise it in this country, but not much; and even if they did, they could not raise enough to interfere with our sugar product.

You beet-sugar men fear the competition of Philippine sugar. I am teetotally opposed to keeping them. You bring in a substitute for this bill providing that we recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands and let them go, and I will vote for it as cheerfully as I ever took a drink of water or of anything else. [Laughter.] We can agree on that. You will get what you want, and I will get what I want. That is the proposition that we ought to be debating here this good hour instead of fooling away time about this tariff bill. What are you going to do with them? You beet-sugar men ought to rise up here unanimously and say, "Let them go."

Mr. DALZELL. I understood the gentleman to say about fifteen minutes ago that our breed never let anything go. Has the gentleman changed his mind?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No, I have not; but I am trying to persuade you to change your minds. [Laughter.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Knowing that they won't change their minds.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I don't know anything of the sort.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman said only a few minutes ago that our breed—I suppose he means the Anglo-Saxon——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Don't say the Anglo-Saxon; say the Teutonic race or the Germanic race.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. He said our breed never relinquishes a foot of land to which they once had title. That was an unqualified assertion?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Why does the gentleman from Missouri ask for what is impossible?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Because wise men change their minds and fools never do. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman has put himself in somewhat of a dilemma there, because he said, not as a matter of opinion, but as a matter of fact, that historically—and I presume he meant always for the future—it was a fact that the Teutonic race never had relinquished and never would relinquish its title to a foot of soil. Now, because he has changed his mind within fifteen minutes, and thinks that perhaps he is a wise man, therefore does he think that all the rest of the Anglo-Saxon or Teutonic race who are not going to do it—and he said they would not—are fools?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Oh, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman can fight that out in his own mind. I am not going to try to enlighten him. [Prolonged laughter and applause.]

There is one other historical fact pertinent in this beet-sugar discussion. There is an old saying that we sometimes build more wisely than we know. Napoleon, despising the crimson glories of a hundred bloody fields, proudly declared that he would descend to posterity with the code in his hand. I will tell you what else he will descend with in his hand—the sugar beet. He is the man who discovered it, though the Germans have developed it. So that Napoleon and the Germans share the honor in this matter of being joint benefactors of the world. If the mighty Corsican had looked forward to this day with prophetic ken he would have put the theory of producing sugar from beets alongside of the code as his clearest titles to imperishable renown. In his case, as in many others, necessity was the mother of invention. The English blockade drove him into the effort to find a substitute for cane sugar. That's about the only good that came to the human race generally from the Napoleonic wars.

Now, about that Anglo-Saxon business—I have heard of that as long as I want to. It is a misnomer. We are not Anglo-Saxons. Most of us—such men as I am, tall of stature, with big bodies, blue eyes, fair skins, and flaxen hair (that's the way Tacitus describes the Germans of the days when Christ walked the earth)—are descended from the great Teutonic or Germanic stock, the imperial race of the world, which for two thousand years has gone forth conquering and to conquer, and not from that little band of Angles and Saxons that went over to ravage England. [Applause and laughter.] They were simply offshoots of the great Germanic or Teutonic people—small offshoots at that.

Mr. BROUSSARD. The gentleman said, or answered, that not a pound of sugar grown in the Philippine Islands coming into this country would go into consumption, but that all of it would have to be remanufactured in order to be used. The gentleman urged subsequently—and I agreed with him—that the differential ought to be taken off sugar entirely in order to destroy the sugar trust. Now, it is a fact that there is no purchaser of sugars that are not refined in this country except the sugar trust. How can the gentleman argue that he wants to destroy the trust by taking off the differential and then reduce the rate on raw sugar in order that the sugar trust might get additional advantage in purchasing sugar from the Philippines, as they do from Cuba, Porto Rica, and Hawaii, to come into this country and go into competition with the beet-sugar people in the West and with the sugar people in the South?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What I say about that, Mr. Chairman, is that the sugar that comes in from the Philippine Islands is a mere bagatelle compared with the immense quantity of sugar that we import from other sources.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I know, but the drop in the bucket business does not answer anything. Is it a fact that the gentleman wants to take off the differential; and if that be true why does the gentleman desire to reduce the tariff on raw sugar the only purchaser of which in this country is the sugar trust, when that would enable the sugar trust to get advantage over the beet-sugar people of the country and the sugar producers in the South?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the question as to the status of the Philippine Islands with reference to the United States, if we are going to hang on to them, rises immeasurably superior to this small question about the tariff on sugar from the Philippine Islands. I did not want the Philippines. I did not want the Sandwich Islands. The Earl of Sandwich gave his name to them, and he is famous forever in the invention of an indigestible article of diet and for giving his name to the Sandwich Islands—and the latter is the greater curse of the two. [Laughter and applause.]

My skirts are clear. I fought the Sandwich Island grab. I have been opposed to the Philippine propaganda from the beginning, and I am now. I believe it is dangerous to the country, if not ruinous. I would let them go this minute. I wish to heaven they were gone. I voted against paying the $20,000,000 to Spain for the Philippines even after the Senate had ratified the treaty. I want that carved on my tombstone when I am dead. Now, I say, gentlemen, that we can not have this anomalous condition of affairs existing any longer; that the Philippine Islands must be considered a part of the United States or they must be considered as foreign territory—one or the other. For our own sakes we ought to put an instant end to this monstrous anomaly of their being half in and half out. That is the paramount question. What disheartens me about this whole business is what leading Republicans say. Four or five years ago a whole day was devoted here once to a debate between the present Speaker of the House, Mr. CANNON; the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. GROSVENOR; the gentleman from Missouri, Judge DE ARMOND, and myself. We took it turn and turn about, thirty minutes at a clip, that day. The Philippine problem was our theme. Finally, in a burst of exuberance and enthusiasm, the present Speaker of the House said we intended to hold on to the Philippine Islands forever and a day. A year ago in the Committee on Ways and Means, Secretary Taft said that we would hold on to them only till such date as we could educate them into a measurable fitness for self-government. When asked how long that would be he said it might outlast this generation. That was more encouragement than what the Speaker said. That filled my heart with gladness; but the other day the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, in a dialogue with Senator NEWLANDS, of Nevada, in the committee room declared that the question of what we are going to do with the Philippine Islands is a question for the next century. So he goes back practically to what the Speaker said. I disliked exceedingly to hear him make that declaration, but he did make it seriously. To hold the Philippine Islands for a hundred years, as the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee says we will, is to do what the Speaker of the House said, hold them "forever and a day," because in that length of time every dollar's worth of property in the Philippine Islands will be owned by Americans, and then if we undertake to get rid of them every blessed one of them will be over here with his cousins and his uncles and his aunts bedeviling Congress not to turn them adrift.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask my friend from Missouri if he has observed the repeated changes of position in this game of progressive euchre, the Philippines being euchred? In the report of the Fifty-eighth Congress, with reference to the American tenure of the Philippines, the report says: "It is distinctly settled we retain them until the people are prepared for self-government." Further along, in that part of the report written this year, the report says: "It is quite certain that, regardless of any opinion we may entertain with reference to our entrance into the Philippine Islands, we are there to stay." Now, I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri, admitting this represents the opinion of the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, if in his judgment that represents the opinion of a majority of the American people, and if they have changed from last year to this year to the same degree that characterizes the movements of the chairman of that committee?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not believe they have. I will tell you what I do believe. Notwithstanding what my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] suggests—and what I said, too, as far as that is concerned—I believe if the Members of this House and Senate could vote to-day a secret ballot, so that no mortal man would be ever able to find out how they did vote, that the Congress would vote almost unanimously to turn those islands loose, and the reason you will not stand up here and vote it is on account of pride. You said the horse is 17 feet high and you are going to stick to it, I suppose. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROUSSARD. If it be true that the only consumer of raw sugar, such as will come from the Philippine Islands under this bill, is the sugar trust, and the gentleman wants to take off the differential in order to cripple and kill the sugar trust, with which I agree, how can the gentleman justify his position now in voting to reduce the raw material which is going to feed additionally the sugar trust?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I say in the first place it does not amount to a hill of beans——

Mr. BROUSSARD. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but that is not answering my question.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I can not answer it any other way except as I know how to answer it. It is no doubt my stupidity that prevents my making myself intelligible to my friend, which I regret.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Well, the gentleman may agree or may not agree with the gentleman that it does not amount to anything. If it does not amount to anything, why does the gentleman support the proposition to permit these people to come into competition with American people with the view of benefiting them, if, in the gentleman's opinion, it does not amount to a hill of beans?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It is this: This anomomalous condition in the Philippine Islands, they being half in the United States and half out—foreign territory when we want to consider it that way, and domestic territory when we want to consider it that way—is absolutely in contravention of any idea the American people ever had on the subject of government.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I agree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, that is all the answer I can make. I do not wish to be impolite, but that is the best I can do with the gentleman from Louisiana. [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman from Louisiana said a moment ago, in answer to my question, that the sugar trust controlled all the sugar except the beet sugar.

Mr. BROUSSARD. That is right.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now he says that the sugar trust controls all, practically.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will tell you how that is. The fact is this, that the beet-sugar people can not sell their sugar higher than the trust sells its sugar. It has got to sell it for less.

If they do not sell it for less, the trust, using its immense power, will run them out of business. That is the whole thing. In that way they control the whole output of American sugar factories.

Mr. BROUSSARD. And, of course, as a logical sequence, if they could get additional supply of raw sugar, they could additionally injure the beet-sugar people.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You cipher out this proposition, my brother, of the relation that 25,000 tons bears to 2,768,000 tons, and then you have got the influence of the Philippine sugar in this market.

Mr. BROUSSARD. That is an easy matter to calculate if a man will sit down with a pencil, but the gentleman is here not legislating against the people who are engaged in industry in this country in favor of a people who are not a part of this country. If that be true, then it follows as a natural sequence that he would not try to benefit those who are trying to injure the people engaged in that business, with a view of helping somebody that is foreign to this Government under the decision he just quoted.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not desire to vote against anybody's interest. I want all Americans and all American industries to have an equal chance—no more, no less. That's all my constituents desire. But I do not propose for them to be gouged all the time—not if I can prevent it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How many acres of land are in sugar in Louisiana?

Mr. BROUSSARD. They raised this year 300,000 tons of sugar.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How many acres?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I do not know.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman not think that it would be a good idea to go down and buy these sugar plantations and turn them out, rather than tax the sugar-using people of all the States to keep up the sugar farms of Louisiana?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. While this debate has been in progress a friend sent me a public document entitled "International Sugar Situation," by Mr. Frank R. Rutter, Assistant Chief of Foreign Markets for the Agricultural Department. This document was issued from the Government Printing Office in 1904. On page 93 is a table giving the average production per acre per annum of sugar cane in Louisiana from 1884–85 to 1901–2, both inclusive. Here it is:

Average production per acre:	Short tons.
1885–86	20
1886–87	14
1888–89	19
1889–90	18
1891–92	16
1892–93	15
1893–94	20
1894–95	20
1895–96	20
1896–97	20
1897–98	23
1898–99	21
1899–1900	16

Which shows that for eighteen years the average was 18⅘ tons per acre. For the ten years from 1892–93 to 1901–2, both inclusive, the average was 19.6 tons per acre per annum, which is within 0.4 of a ton of 20, which I stated in the beginning was the average per acre. For 1902–3, 1903–4, 1904–5, and 1905–6 it is perhaps fully 20, which fully establishes my contention that cane-sugar raising is thrice as profitable as corn raising.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, there is a question in the American public mind that rises in importance above this little Philippine sugar bill as Pikes Peak towers above the foothills at its base, and it is pressing for solution. You may try to dodge it and escape it here, but it is certain to be on the tapis until it is settled. I refer to the revision or the readjustment of the exorbitant rates in the Dingley tariff bill. If there were nobody asking for that except Democrats I would be almost hopeless, in the present posture of affairs, of any revision; but the demand is widespread; it is insistent. It extends from Marthas Vineyard to Sioux City, Iowa, if no farther. [Laughter.] It will finally become loud enough to penetrate even the thick walls of this Capitol. I will tell you what Hon. Albert B. Cummins said the other day. All of you—especially the members of the Hawkeye delegation—know who Albert B. Cummins is. He is one of the foremost citizens of Iowa, a magnificent Commonwealth, rich in statesmen, unfortunately chiefly of the Republican school. He is a Republican, filling his second term as governor, and, as I understand it, a candidate for the Republican Presidential nomination, or a candidate for a third term in the gubernatorial chair; if neither of these, then a candidate against Senator Dolliver for his seat; if none of these, a candidate against Governor HULL for his seat in this House.

In a speech not long since he said, inter alia:

> The total life insurance grafts for all time had not been one-fifth of the annual amount of which the people have been despoiled by the excessive tariff rates.

The annual amount of tariff extortions, mark you!

This language is so plain that it needs no diagram to explain it. Here is an editorial comment on it from the Creston, Iowa, Advertiser, a Republican paper:

> Who said that? Bryan? Guess again. BOURKE COCKRAN or JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS or Grover Cleveland or ex-Congressman Wade or CHAMP CLARK? You still have a guess coming. Better give it up. Well, those are the words of Governor Cummins. Is it any wonder that he is patted on the back by every Democrat who speaks of him? Nor should it be forgotten in this connection that Governor Cummins, who thus attacks a law that was enacted by the Republican party and which was hailed with joy by the whole Republican party, puts in a great deal of his time questioning the Republicanism of those who will not accept his leadership. Governor Cummins no doubt believes that he is a Republican and a protectionist or he would not say so. From the standpoint of morals he is an honest man. But it seems to us that he is intellectually dishonest; that a perfervid imagination which finds expression in extravagant language and an egotism which causes him to regard all opposition to his views as a personal affront have rendered him incapable of properly estimating the trend and effect of some of his utterances. One shudders to think what he would say of a Republican protective tariff law if he were not a Republican and a protectionist.

This editorial comment of the Creston, Iowa, Advertiser, is approvingly quoted by the American Economist, organ in chief of the stand-patters. I read the Economist very closely, because it is very ably edited and because it is the highest authority on stand-patism. As you let that extract from Governor Cummins percolate through your brains remember that he is one of the strongest Republicans in the United States, a power in his party. By reading it in connection with the Advertiser's comment, as quoted approvingly by the Economist, one may accurately measure the quantity and quality of harmony now existing in the Republican party. It is Kilkenny-cat harmony intensified and aggravated.

Mr. LACEY. I would ask my friend if that statement is Republican, was not there a stronger Democratic symptom in it?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes [laughter]; a Democratic symptom that in all human probability will land somewhere from 25 to 50 per cent of the Republican voters of Iowa in the Democratic columns. God be praised! [Great laughter.]

I am not going to rest on what Governor Cummins said, for there is an old saying that "one swallow does not make a summer." Here is the testimony, clear and strong, of another eminent Republican witness. In November the Republicans of Massachusetts got their second wind and elected a Republican governor in the person of Hon. Curtis Guild, jr. When he was elected he was so tickled by his success that he took his pen in hand and wrote a very affectionate epistle to the President of the United States. It is one that Horace Greeley would have characterized as "mighty interesting reading." Here it is, some of it:

MY DEAR PRESIDENT: We have had a hard-fought election in Massachusetts.

Notwithstanding the fact that Roosevelt carried the State by 170,000 in 1904. Now, listen:

The Republican ticket, in my judgment, would have been overwhelmingly defeated if our platform, on which both Mr. Draper and I stood—had not contained a plank indorsing the position taken last spring by our delegation in Congress favoring an immediate tariff revision.

Draper was the candidate for lieutenant-governor—

Bless your soul, "immediate tariff revision!" Light is breaking in the East at last. These Old Bay State Republicans can't wait; they demand "immediate tariff revision"—yes, "immediate."

Now, if Massachusetts, which Charles Sumner claimed cradled the Republican party, although the Michiganders claim that it was born out in Jackson under the oaks—if Massachusetts is in danger of going with the Democrats on tariff revision, it is high time the solons of this House were turning their most careful attention to the subject.

The Governor continues:

Both parties in this State desire it.

That is, immediate tariff revision.

We recognize, as Republicans, the magnificent prosperity that has come to us so largely through your own personal work.

He means President Roosevelt's work.

The opinion of Governor Guild, when he wrote that letter, evidently was that President Roosevelt makes the seasons come and go, makes the sun shine and the rains from heaven descend.

After handing that taffy to the President, Governor Guild, still declaring himself a protectionist, referring to the Dingley bill, says:

In that tariff, however, there are certain duties that we must all admit are no longer needed. Nothing was said in the campaign here in regard to the iron schedule, as a whole.

I think you will find, however, that even the iron manufacturers themselves will admit that a duty on iron ore is no longer necessary and that a reduction on such iron products as we are exporting so heavily could be made without injuring our domestic industry.

Here in Massachusetts the duty on hides is an anathema. It is known that only 23 per cent of the hides and skins that come into the United States are subject to duty, and it seems perfectly illogical that calfskins, sheepskins, and goatskins should come in free as a by-product not needing protection, while a duty is assessed on the skins of full-grown cattle.

I have the honor to inclose a canvass of New England on the subject of such hides. It will show you that the shoe manufacturers of this section are clamoring merely for tariff revision on the products of other States, but that they themselves are willing to submit to a reduction of the duties on boots and shoes if the last remnant of this needless duty can be removed from their material.

There can be no question of the desire of the overwhelming majority of the people of this State for attention to such matters as this in the immediate revision of the tariff.

Nor can there be any question of their urgent desires that you should see your way clear to incorporate some suggestion of the kind, which, of course, I should not for a moment presume to dictate in your message.

I am sure you know, sir, the deep loving affection of the people of this Commonwealth for you. They trust you, sir, more absolutely than any other man in public life. I am sure you will understand that I have not the slightest intention of forestalling any action of yours; nor is this letter given to the press although I have not the slightest objection to your quoting it or using it in any way you desire. I do deem it, however, my duty with the trust that has just been placed in my hands to inform you of the real condition of public feeling in this Commonwealth, as your every act shows that no Commonwealth is dearer to you than the Bay State, and that not even her own representatives are more earnest than you in wishing her welfare.

That pathetic and eloquent appeal seems to have fallen on deaf ears.

Let us see what the situation is. Here is Massachusetts "kneeling with the rest," to borrow a phrase from one of her most illustrious sons, joining hands with Iowa, clear across the continent nearly, in favor of tariff revision, Cummins and Guild—par nobile fratrum—and that crowd are, in the parlance of the present day, called "tariff rippers;" the rest of you gentlemen are called "tariff stand-patters." That is a phrase Senator Hanna borrowed from the poker table. [Laughter.] If he were living to-day and read the newspapers he would think the Republican party held "a bobtailed flush" on the tariff question. [Loud laughter.]

Last summer there was a reciprocity convention out in Chicago. It was attended by a great many eminent Republicans, among them Uncle SHELBY M. CULLOM, senior and perpetual Senator from Illinois, who prides himself on his physical resemblance to Abraham Lincoln. [Laughter.] He made about as good a reciprocity speech on that occasion as a "tariff ripper" could have made. Since that he seems to have returned to his stand-pat wallow. The cause of his apparent change of base was, I apprehend, that when the reciprocity convention was in session he was hard pressed about his reelection to the Senate. Having got all the opposition out of the way he falls in again with the dominant wing of his party.

The devil was sick, the devil a monk would be;
The devil was well, the devil a monk was he.

That convention declared in favor of one of the most beautiful theories I have ever heard of, "a maximum and minimum tariff." That is the great panacea which is to cure all the ills that American human flesh is heir to, and its supporters were from Massachusetts to California. Now, that scheme worked all right until Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE introduced a bill in the United States Senate fixing a minimum and a maximum tariff rate with the Dingley rate for the "steady-tariff company," so to speak, with a sliding scale favoring the nations below us in tariff rates and a sliding scale to punish other nations above us in tariff rates. Clearly the Senator strives to please. That is such an elastic proposition that it might please anybody, because nobody can tell precisely what it means. Therefore everybody can construe it to suit himself. To stand-patters it means to "let well enough alone." To "tariff rippers" it means tariff "readjustment." To advocates of reciprocity it means "reciprocity." The moving cause of the Senator's activity is the awful scare Massachusetts Republicans received last fall. He is decidedly in favor of free hides for Massachusetts factories, for he says so himself. But, priding himself on his Republicanism, he rashly declared that he wanted no help from Democrats in tariff revision. It must be done by its friends, the Republicans, so he says. If he lives till the stand-patters give Massachusetts what she seeks in the way of tariff revision, they will have to substitute the name of HENRY CABOT LODGE for that of Methuselah as "the oldest man that ever lived." The illustrious Senator is mistaken. He will change his mind and accept the help of Democrats, for Massachusetts factories must have free raw materials or they will perish from the earth. Indeed, he misstates the case, for he and his constituents will be forced to help the Democrats instead of the Democrats helping him and his. A reasonable revision of the exorbitant Dingley rates is a Democratic proposition, not Republican. It is well to have an understanding on that point now. We welcome Senator LODGE and his Republican constituents as allies in this sane and pleasing movement for the general welfare.

What do the Massachusetts Republicans want in the way of tariff reform? They want free hides, free coal, free lumber, free raw materials for their factories; but the Massachusetts tariff reformers need not conclude suddenly and prematurely that all the rest of the tariff reformers in this country are idiots. They can get free hides provided they will cut down the tariff on boots and shoes and harness and leather sufficiently, but they will not get free hides unless they do that. [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from Missouri support a proposition for free hides coupled with a proposition to take the duty off the products of leather?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. So quick that it would make your head swim. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. At all events, then, we have a valuable ally.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You have got me right now on that.

Senator LODGE, as I understand it, advocates repealing the tariff on hides, because "it is such a little one," two million and something. Now, if they will go the whole hog up there and remove the tariff on boots, shoes, and leather, we can come to an agreement and pass it through this House.

But there are "stand-patters"—and I have one in my eye right now—who never yield an inch. My distinguished friend from Minnesota [Mr. MCCLEARY] heads the list—like Abou Ben Adhem's, "his name leads all the rest." He has introduced into this House "a maximum and minimum tariff bill" that makes the cold chills creep up and down the spinal columns of the reciprocity shouters. His maximum and minimum tariff bill is to make the Dingley rates the minimum and only Omniscience can tell what the maximum would be. [Laughter.] I admire his courage. He is consistent in wrongdoing. When the Republican reciprocity brethren read the McCleary bill they must have been in a frame of mind to exclaim with Truthful James on a celebrated occasion:

Do I sleep, do I dream?
Do I wonder and doubt?
Are things what they seem?
Or is visions about?
Is our civilization a failure?
Is the Caucasian played out?

Somewhere in the Bible there is an account given of a man out of whom the devils were cast, and he seemed to be in good condition, like a house swept and garnished. Then the devils in increased numbers got into him again, and the verdict of the Bible on that man is that "his last state was worse than his first." And that will be precisely the fix in which the reciprocity reformers will find themselves when Brother McCLEARY'S bill is enacted into law.

There is another remarkable statement in the papers. I do not vouch for the truth of it at all. I give it as I read it. That is, that the President of the United States entered into a modus vivendi with the Speaker of this House [laughter] by which the Speaker is to permit or facilitate—whichever is the proper word—railroad-rate regulation during this session, provided the President will not send in any message in favor of tariff revision.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask my friend a most important question.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Does he believe one word of that story?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am not on the witness stand. [Laughter.] Modus vivendi! John G. Saxe says that Sancho Panza said: "God bless the man who first invented sleep." Divers other persons must say: "God bless the man who first invented that convenient phrase 'modus vivendi.'" Like the mantle of charity, it covers a multitude of sins. The President of the United States entered into a modus vivendi with his great and good friend President Morales, of Santo Domingo, and Morales has taken to the woods, carrying his Government and the modus vivendi with him. Now the papers say that the Administration is trying to cook up a modus vivendi with Germany. We are likely to have a surplus lot of modus vivendi on hand. [Laughter.]

I saw the other day in a newspaper that Mr. Secretary of State Root is engaged in tutoring Mr. Secretary Shaw, of the Treasury, on the subject of the tariff with Germany! That is the most astounding statement that has been made since "the stars fell." I am not certain but it is the most amazing statement that has been made since the morning stars first sang together for joy. Tutor Mr. Secretary Shaw in the art of tariff making? It's a thing incredible! Does he not stand at the very head of the "stand-pat" element in this country? The chief among 10,000, if not altogether lovely! [Laughter.] Does he not, with hand on his heart, solemnly reiterate the declaration of the Republican platform that "A Democratic tariff has always been followed by business adversity; a Republican tariff by business prosperity?"

Does he not religiously believe that a man can lift himself over the fence by tugging at his own boot straps? Is he not firm in the faith that a people can make themselves rich beyond the dreams of avarice by taxing themselves within an inch of their lives? And, last of all, did he not a little while ago discover the remarkable fact that a high protective tariff increases imports into this country, when the doctrine had always been, and the very reason that the law was passed was, that a high protective tariff diminishes imports and if high enough shuts them out altogether, thereby giving the American manufacturer the control of the American market? That discovery certainly entitles Secretary Shaw to rank with Copernicus, Galileo, Sir Isaac Newton, Lord Bacon, and Christopher Columbus.

Now, if Secretary Root should undertake to tutor him on any subject under heaven other than the tariff there would be some sense in it. I would like to be where I could hear and see that performance of tutoring him on the tariff. Certain as you live the Secretary of State will lead a strenuous life when he essays that stunt. Under his administration of the Treasury it has been solemnly decided that frogs' legs imported into this country must come in as poultry. [Laughter.] Under his administration of the Treasury it has been decided that a pony shipped into this country must come in as household goods. Under his administration of the Treasury it has been decided that a rooster is not a breeding animal! Governor Shaw is a very amiable man. He is possessed of a brilliant intellect. He is one of the best public speakers in this country. He is a delightful raconteur. If the stand-patters control the next Republican national convention—and it is a ten to one shot that they will—and if they do not nominate him for President of the United States, they will demonstrate that not only republics, but stand-pat Republicans as well, are ungrateful. If they control that convention, he is destined to be the Republican standard bearer, unless there rides into the Presidential lists that grim and grizzled warrior, JOSEPH G. CANNON, of Illinois. [Great applause.]

What is the trouble about the tariff here now? What is the pressing necessity of the case? I will tell you what it is. Germany has passed a new tariff bill, raising its rates on imports from this country sky-high. That bill goes into effect next March.

Every American citizen is or should be interested in the subject.

In the calendar year 1904—the last for which I have seen the figures—we bought from Germany about one hundred and twenty-four millions of dollars' worth of her products and sold to her about two hundred and thirty-six million dollars' worth of our products—constituting about one-sixth of our total exports. Of our two hundred and thirty-six millions of dollars' worth of exports to Germany, $53,877,500 were food products, as follows:

Fresh apples	$625,000
Oil cake	5,525,000
Sausage casings, etc	2,625,000
Clover seed	832,500
Linseed	375,000
Bran	186,000
Malt germs	417,750
Wheat	6,675,000
Wheat flour	291,000
Maize	4,825,000
Cotton-seed oil	2,825,000
Tallow	1,425,000
Lard	16,300,000
Oleomargarine	4,475,000
Beef	525,000
Pork	25,000
Hams	25,000
Bacon	375,000
Salt fish	600,000
Butter	125,250
Dried fruit	4,800,000
Total	53,877,500

During the calendar year of 1904 Germany bought of us raw materials to the value of $160,262,000, as follows:

Cotton	$84,375,000
Cotton waste	2,075,000
Copper	30,025,000
Lead	1,050,000
Aluminium	220,750
Zinc ore	358,250
Resin, etc	2,975,000
Turpentine, etc	4,200,000
Acetate of lime, etc	775,000
Phosphate of lime, etc	3,800,000
Wood spirit	$342,750
India rubber	265,250
Hides	1,200,000
Fur skins, etc	1,675,000
Petroleum and mineral lubricants	17,425,000
Stearic and palmitic acid	875,000
Lumber	6,675,000
Tobacco	1,950,000
Total	160,262,000

These two tables show:

Food products	$53,877,500
Raw materials	160,262,000
Grand total	214,139,500

The rest of the $236,000,000 worth of products which we sold to Germany in 1904 consisted of manufactured articles.

Let each Representative here from the great agricultural or mining section scan those tables closely and decide whether his constituents will be benefited by a tariff war with Germany—to say nothing of a tariff war with combined Europe, of which the tariff war with Germany is only the forerunner.

I represent one of the richest agricultural districts in the world, and my constituents are interested in selling to Germany nearly ever article in the foregoing table of exports of food products to Germany and in several of the articles in the table of our raw materials which Germany buys from us.

I want to read to the Members just a few of the things that this German tariff is going to do for us.

The memorial I am about to read was sent to Congress by the American Reciprocal Tariff League. Does this league consist of a batch of "hare-brained free-traders?" No. On the contrary, this memorial is headed up with a fine portrait of President McKinley, flanked by quotations from his farewell speech at Buffalo. It is signed by eastern and western Republicans, New England manufacturers, Iowa farmers, editors of farm journals, and men from all walks of life. It is a great protest against the Dingley tariff bill, which has brought upon us already the beginnings of a tariff war in which most of the nations of the earth will probably join, unless something is speedily done to prevent it. Germany, Argentina, and China are already getting into the band wagon—the latter countries doing so doubtless because of the influence of Germany, paramount in both cases.

This memorial is one of the results of the Chicago conference, and the league is formed of delegates to that remarkable meeting. Among the influential Republicans signing the memorial no names carry greater weight to the thoughtful mind than those of Alvin H. Saunders, of the Breeders' Gazette, and Harry C. Wallace, of Wallace's Farmer, the greatest farm journals in America, one published in Chicago, the other in Des Moines. No one can estimate too high the influence of these great journals with the farmers of the beef and pork producing regions. There is scarcely a farmer in Iowa who does not read one or both of them. From them they get the world's best thought on topics of direct interest to the farmer and stock raiser. Here is a fair sample of the argument contained in the memorial to which these men's names are signed. Will such arguments make Republican or Democratic votes in the West?

This convention was preeminently and at base an agrarian demonstration. The farmers and stockmen of the corn belt and the range are not sharing in any fair degree in the undoubted prosperity that has come to the chief beneficiaries of the law as mutilated by a Senatorial minority. They are being robbed of markets for their surplus products which could be opened to them through the medium of reciprocal tariff concessions. For example:

Germany is the second largest buyer of food products in the world. She would probably take from $50,000,000 to $75,000,000 worth of American farm products annually under any fair scheme of reciprocity. France would buy perhaps one-half as much under reasonable trading arrangements. The American farmer has a $4,500,000,000 crop of cereals this year. The application of scientific methods is vastly enlarging our soil production. There is ordinarily an enormous surplus of farm products in excess of domestic wants. Heavy buying by Germany in anticipation of the closing of the ports of the Empire against us March 1, 1906, is helping our grain markets some just now, but what of the future? Let us quote from the Department of Commerce and Labor on the conditions to be met after the date mentioned:

"The rates on provisions have been greatly advanced by the new German tariff. Bacon, which hitherto paid the highest ad valorem in the list of provisions coming from the United States—viz, 23 per cent—is advanced 80 per cent in the new general tariff, while no rate is provided for in the conventional tariff. The duty on pork, which amounted to 21 per cent ad valorem in 1903, is advanced 176 per cent.

"The duty on beef, amounting to 15 per cent ad valorem in 1903, is raised 200 per cent under the new general and 80 per cent under the conventional tariff. Lard, with a duty of 11 per cent ad valorem in 1903, will be subject to a rate 25 per cent higher in the new general tariff, while in the new conventional the rate remains unchanged. Agricultural machinery, which pays on the average about 4 per cent ad valorem, will be subject to rates from 20 per cent to 88 per cent higher, according to the weight."

Indian corn is king in the agriculture of the Middle West. It can be best marketed in the form of meats, in the production of which we lead the world. It is all well enough to point to the enormous dividends and surplus of the iron masters and sugar refiners and to cite that as a good and sufficient reason for "letting well enough alone," but the prospects of thousands of hardworking farmers in the great feeding and grazing States are not so alluring. Receipts of cattle at Chicago this fall have run from 10,000 to 30,000 head weekly in excess of the known home requirements, the result being heavy losses to growers. A market that can care for, say, 60,000 cattle per week at prices profitable to the producer can not digest 100,000. While this glut is seen at home, a meat famine exists in Europe. With train loads of bullocks selling as low as $3.50 per hundredweight in Chicago and with dressed beef wholesaled there at 6 cents per pound, live cattle and swine are worth in Germany 15 cents per pound. Surely there is something out of joint economically when such a state of affairs exists.

Those are a few of the things that that German tariff is going to do for us, unless we enter into rational reciprocal relations with her. I have not time to go over the entire list. I want to say, and I say it in all earnestness, that if the German tariff goes into effect next March the price of cattle will go down, the price of hogs will go down, the price of wheat will go down, the price of corn will go down, the price of lard, butter, dried fruits, and every product of the farm will go down.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Does the gentleman from Missouri therefore advocate that the American people shall be dictated to by every foreign nation that undertakes to fix our tariff rate for us or shall we have some independent character of our own, as we always have had, and let these people take care of themselves as they have always tried to do?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is a pertinent question fairly asked, and I will answer it with as much candor as it is asked. I hope I am fully as good and true an American as he or any other man is. While I am always willing to fight, if there is any sufficient reason for it, I have no hankering after a fight merely for the sake of a fight. I believe in the Jeffersonian doctrine: "Peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations—entangling alliances with none." The gentleman in this tariff matter seems to be in the frame of mind of the fellow that Edmund Burke told about, who was bent on shearing a wolf. Kind friends explained to him the hazard, futility, and profitlessness of the undertaking, but he insisted on shearing the wolf, to his own great grief and to much laceration of his own flesh.

Commerce is not a one-sided or jug-handled affair. It must be arranged and maintained on a basis of fair exchange. If we could run the world's commerce, if we were the only producers of food products and raw materials, we would be in position to dictate terms to all the peoples of the earth and to assume the position which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] seems to assume. But "there are others"—several other nations engaged in creating food products and raw materials—and we would be more courageous than wise to slap Germany squarely in the face, for she, next to Great Britain, is the largest customer for our food products and raw materials. Our farmers have a vast surplus of products to sell, and they desire more to secure profitable markets for their surplus than to maintain at a dead loss—a great loss, a ruinous loss—the stand-pat tariff theory.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is there now or was there ever in the history of commercial intercourse between two nations a time when a nation that was compelled to buy $500,000,000 worth of bread—using the term for foodstuff—can dictate to a nation that produces enormous quantities to sell the terms upon which international exchanges shall be made? Suppose, now, that they bar our breadstuffs and everything else of the kind, how long would it be until Germany would be on its knees begging for an opportunity to buy our breadstuffs? It has been stated to me by an authority which I have no doubt about that if there was a cordon of ships drawn around the British islands so that there could be no import of food products, in ninety days there would be enormous suffering for food by the British people. Does that proposition not apply to every other nation of the world that does not produce its own food products?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That proposition applies partially to every nation on earth that does not produce its own food supply. If this were the only nation that produced a surplus of food supplies, then the gentleman's question would be decisive of this contest.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman state a nation that is able to do it—in actual figures. I have such a great admiration for the gentleman's imagination that I must ask him to deal in facts on this question. I want to know what nation now can supply its own demand first and then supply the German people if they bar the American producer out of their market?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The South American republics can furnish Germany and England all of the food supplies that they need. One deplorable result of our high-tariff policy is that it has set South America, Australia, India, and Russia to raising in large and ever-increasing quantities the identical food products which our farmers produce. And now the stand-patters are recklessly for a tariff war with combined Europe.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And at cheaper rates, I presume, than we can?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then, may I ask my friend why we have had the enormous traffic in these commodities up to the very date of the assembling of this Congress—traffic with those two nations? Do they buy where they can buy the cheapest, or where they have to pay the dearest price?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The reason they have been buying from us more than they have been buying from the South American republics is that we have bought more from them. Precisely. They, as well as we, made money by trading with each other.

I thought I had here the exact figures about the Argentine Republic's production of foodstuffs, but I find I have misplaced them; but here is an editorial from the St. Louis Globe-Democrat bearing directly on the subject. The gentleman from Ohio ought to believe the Globe-Democrat, for it is high Republican authority. It says:

The United States exports of wheat and flour are increasing, but they are far below the figures for some of the recent years at this time. For the fiscal year 1905, which ended on June 30, the exports of wheat and of flour counted as wheat were only 44,000,000 bushels, which were below the shipments of any previous year for a third of a century. There is likely to be a gain for the twelve months ending with next June, but the exports will be small compared with those of 1902 or 1903.

The wheat crop of 1905 will figure up about 700,000,000 bushels. It is the largest crop ever grown in this country except in 1901, when it was 748,000,000. While we exported 216,000,000 bushels of wheat in 1901, we will not send out half that quantity this year. Our balance of trade will have to be created by the exports of cotton, of mining and forestry products, and of manufactures. Happily our sales of manufactures abroad are increasing with great speed.

We still lead all the countries of the world in wheat production, and raise more than a fifth of the world's aggregate yield, but Russia and Argentina are furnishing more wheat now to the great importing markets of Europe than the United States. We produce more than two-thirds of the world's corn, but Argentina is getting ahead of us in corn exports. She consumes comparatively little of her wheat and corn at home, while we use the greater part of ours.

That Globe-Democrat editorial fits the case like a glove and fully answers the question of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman will allow me, I would supplement that statement with the following statement: That during good times—a synonymous term for Republican times—the average American citizen consumes 25 per cent more of the products of the earth than he does during hard times—the synonymous term being Democratic times—and in that way the gentleman will understand the reason why we have not shipped our food stuffs abroad. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Very well; we shall see about that. You are entitled to all the applause you will receive on that statement when we are through discussing it. Now, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] is a very distinguished man. I think a great deal of him personally. I have tried my everlasting best to enlighten his intellect in a great many debates we have had, but his mind seems to be as impervious to a fact of history as a duck's back is to a gentle April shower. As a complete reply to and refutation of what he has just said about Republican times being synonymous with good times and Democratic times being synonymous with hard times, I will now read you the evidence of a most distinguished Republican. I would not think of quoting a Democrat to Republicans. James Gillespie Blaine assuredly had some standing in the Republican party. He was fondly called "the Plumed Knight." He was its well-beloved leader—its chosen chieftain—one of the most brilliant men that ever figured in American politics. I will not run a parallel between him and the gentleman from Ohio. When Blaine came to write a book—mind you, not making a stump speech—not even in the heat and excitement of a debate in Congress, where any man might be mistaken as to his facts, but when he sat down calmly in the quiet of his library with all of the facilities and the leisure for investigation to write a book on which he proposed to rest his fame with posterity, he wrote what I am going to read, and I will give it as my literary opinion—you can take it for what it is worth—that Blaine's book is the best historical work ever written in America: that is, the first volume, which was composed before he was embittered by his defeat for the Presidency. There has been constant iteration and reiteration by Republicans of the statement in the Republican platform, which the gentleman from Ohio has parodied, that a Republican tariff is always followed by business prosperity and a Democratic tariff by business adversity. There is not a syllable of truth in it. Here is what Blaine said, and if I had my way about it every Republican in the United States should commit this passage to memory and recite it every morning regularly, when he got up, as part of his prayers. [Laughter.]

> The Whig victory of 1848 was not sufficiently decisive to warrant any attempt, even had there been desire, to change the tariff. General Taylor had been elected without subscribing to a platform or pledging himself to a specific measure, and he was therefore in a position to resist and reject appeals of the ordinary partisan character. Moreover, the tariff of 1846—and that is the only genuinely Democratic tariff bill ever passed by the American Congress. It is called the "Walker tariff," and was so thoroughly Democratic that it was only gotten through the Senate by the casting vote of the Vice-President, George M. Dallas. Usually the Vice-President's chief function is to wait for a dead man's shoes—truly a most grewsome position—but two or three times in our history the Vice-Presidents, acting in their capacity as Presidents of the Senate, have given casting votes which have made history, and Dallas did it. Now, here is what Blaine said about that tariff:

> Moreover, the tariff of 1846 was yielding abundant revenue, and the business of the country was in a flourishing condition at the time his administration was organized. Money became very abundant after the year 1849; large enterprises were undertaken; speculation was prevalent, and for a considerable period the prosperity of the country was general and apparently genuine. After 1852 the Democrats had almost undisputed control of the Government, and had gradually become a free-trade party. The principles embodied in the tariff of 1846 seemed for the time to be so entirely vindicated and approved that resistance to it ceased, not only among the people but among the protection economists, and even among the manufacturers to a large extent. So general was the acquiescence that in 1856 a protective tariff was not even suggested or even hinted by any one of the three parties which presented Presidential candidates.

And that is the only period in our history when such unanimity existed on the subject of the tariff—the only one. I defy any mortal man to point out another period concerning which Blaine's statement would be true.

With all due respect to the gentleman from Ohio, with all due respect to the majority, with all due respect to every politician or statesman now living, the extract I have just read is a complete and overwhelming answer to the declaration of the Republican platform that was repeated by General GROSVENOR in substance, that is repeated by Secretary Shaw every time he makes a speech and thinks of it, to the effect that the Republican tariff is always followed by business prosperity and a Democratic tariff by business adversity. We ought never to hear that fable again so long as the earth spins around on its axis or slides down the elliptic.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, if the gentleman will allow an interruption, I know it will not disconcert him, because nothing I can say will disturb the peace of mind in which he constantly moves upon this question. The tariff of 1846, the Walker tariff, was immediately followed by the Mexican war, and that by the great discovery of gold in California.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And Mr. Blaine wrote of that period of 1852 in which an abnormal condition existed.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But Mr. Blaine has pointed out that in 1857 the hardest times that ever came to the American people came when the Democratic party destroyed the Walker tariff bill and substituted another one that finally precipitated the country into practically general bankruptcy; so that in order to read Mr. Blaine correctly and get the full benefit of his opinion you must not stop at a single period, but you must carry out the illustration that the gentleman himself draws so graphically and eloquently.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is the gentleman willing to stand on that statement?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do, most undoubtedly. I have stood on it a great many times.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, it is true, gentlemen, that the Mexican war intervened, and that undoubtedly helped prosperity. It is true that the great discoveries of gold in California intervened, as well as those in Australia. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] left out that part of his case. But that discovery helped. It is true that there was a panic.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Is it not true, too, that during that period the Crimean war came?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is also true; that was an element in the prosperity of those years. I want to be fair. We can all be honest if we can not be great. [Laughter.] I will state the whole case, and I will state it so that nobody who hears can ever forget it. That those events helped the prosperity that Blaine speaks of as extending from 1846 to 1857 is beyond all cavil. In the fall of 1857 there was a spell of hard times.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It lasted two years.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; it lasted two years. The Globe-Democrat, in an unguarded moment, when some great banks broke recently, said editorially, in comparing the present situation with that of 1857: "The wild speculation in western lands and in constructing railways beyond the immediate needs of the country, which were the chief causes of the wreck in 1857, are conspicuously absent now." That is the truth, and was stated to help reassure the people last summer when there was a decidedly panicky feeling abroad in the land. Surely the gentleman, who has a great reputation at stake in all he says or does, will not claim for one moment that the Democratic Administrations of Pierce and Polk or the Whig Administrations of Taylor and Fillmore were in any way responsible for that wild speculation in western land and in railway construction, for that would be preposterous, too preposterous even for him to assert or for even Republicans to believe. Neither is it true that in 1857, or at any other time, the Democrats destroyed the Walker tariff bill and substituted another which precipitated the country into general bankruptcy. That is where the distinguished gentleman from Ohio fell down. I will give you a history of that transaction.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman state whether the tariff of 1857, which was a Democratic tariff, did not reduce the schedules of the Walker tariff bill?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If you will let me alone for ten consecutive minutes I will state it exactly as it is.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am sure I have no right to interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; the gentleman has a perfect right to do so. I am always glad that he does it. It may be said of him what Doctor Johnson said of Oliver Goldsmith: "He touches nothing which he does not adorn."

The tariff bill of 1857, which the gentleman says precipitated universal bankruptcy, was not a Democratic measure, as I will presently demonstrate. That's fact No. 1 in the chapter of our legislative and political history which I am now stating.

The Walker tariff bill, which I repeat was the only thoroughly Democratic tariff bill ever placed upon our statute books, and for which Democrats not only cheerfully but proudly and enthusiastically assumed all the responsibility and claim all the honors for it wrought gloriously for our country's prosperity, was in force from July 30, 1846, when James K. Polk signed it, till March 3, 1857, when Franklin Pierce signed the tariff bill of 1857, modifying the Walker tariff bill. Please bear these dates carefully in mind, as they are absolutely decisive of the controversy between the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] and myself here to-day and betwixt all Democrats and all Republicans at all times, at all places, and under all circumstances. If plain, unvarnished, undisputed, and incontrovertible facts of history can prove anything in this world, I will suddenly and for all time establish the Democratic contention on the eternal rock of truth and prove beyond even the shadow of a doubt that the Republican platform declaration of 1904 that "A Democratic tariff has always been followed by business adversity, a Republican tariff by business prosperity," is a glittering, transparent, and stupendous fable. I use the word fable instead of a shorter and harsher synonym because I desire to observe all the parliamentary proprieties. I confidently place the well-established truths of history against bald assertions. I am so certain that the tariff bill of 1857 was not a Democratic tariff measure that I most heartily thank the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] for his interruption.

That bill became a law of the land on the last day of the life of the Thirty-fourth Congress, the 3d day of March, 1857.

The House of Representatives of that Congress was not Democratic. It was composed of 83 Democrats, 108 Republicans, and 43 Americans, popularly dubbed "Knownothings," making 234 Members all told, 118 constituting a majority of the House. The combined opposition to the Democrats had a majority of 68. The Senate was Democratic; so was the President, Franklin Pierce. After a long and bitter contest Gen. Nathaniel Prentiss Banks, of Massachusetts, was elected Speaker, the first Republican Speaker.

It is known to every intelligent person that tariff bills, called revenue bills, must originate in the House. Consequently the tariff bill of 1857, of whose effect the gentleman from Ohio complains, and which supplanted the Walker Democratic tariff bill, originated in and was passed by an anti-Democratic House, therefore it is clearly a non-Democratic measure. Its character was not changed into a Democratic measure by being agreed to by a Democratic Senate and signed by a Democratic President.

Truth to tell, it may be said to have been passed by common consent of all parties, and it was so passed, because on the 3d day of March, 1857, the country was enjoying unbounded prosperity and there was an overflowing Treasury. Among hands they cut the rates too low for a good revenue measure, and when the evil days came in the fall of 1857, produced, as the Globe-Democrat says, by wild speculation in western lands and in building superfluous railroads, it did not bring in enough money to run the Government.

How any well-informed or candid person can claim that that bill of 1857, non-Democratic though it was, produced the panic in the autumn of 1857 is a puzzle; for hard times extended at that period over the face of the entire civilized globe, and certainly no man who has any reputation for wisdom or veracity to lose will jeopardize it by asserting that any tariff law passed by us can create hard times all over the world.

The only difficulty about the tariff bill of 1857 was that, hard times coming on unexpectedly, it did not raise revenue enough to pay the expenses of the Government.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is not that the gentleman's present position?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No, sir; most assuredly I am always in favor of revenue enough to run the Government, economically administered—which is the Democratic theory. You are running behind now at the rate of about a half million dollars a day, are you not?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, no. The gentleman's prognostication upon that subject is not good. In the last Congress, it will be remembered, he predicted that at this time we would be hunting around for some source of revenue, and talked about increased taxation. Where is that ghost of increased taxation now?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You will be hunting around for it before you get away from here.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not at all. We are able to meet every demand of the time and leave a surplus at the end of the year.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me ask the gentleman a question now, while he is on his feet. Turn about is fair play.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is right.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Are we going to have any river and harbor bill at this session?

Mr. GROSVENOR. If we need one.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman knows that we need it. Don't try to get out of it in that way. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. My recollection is that under a Democratic Congress, during which I had the honor to be on the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, at the end of the second session we passed a moderate river and harbor bill, and a Democratic President vetoed it. Now, last year, at the end of the Fifty-eighth Congress, we passed a large river and harbor bill. Under our new system of contracting we shall not need a new river and harbor bill except for new or comparatively new projects, so that the sundry civil bill will carry the amount of appropriation for the rivers and harbors far in advance of any that the Democrats have ever passed.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, gentlemen, I want you to bear witness to that testimony. That statement is made ex cathedra. The gentleman well speaks as "one having authority."

Mr. GROSVENOR. But not as a scribe.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. He belongs to the great triumvirate in this House that runs things, composed of the Speaker and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] and the gentleman from Ohio. He is one of the "Three Czars," and you men who want anything done for the rivers and harbors in your districts hearken unto his voice, for according to his statement just made there is not going to be anything done except on work that has already been started.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hope the gentleman will not misrepresent the organization of the House. The river and harbor bill is a privileged bill, and does not require the action of the Committee on Rules. I hope the gentleman will remember that in all the future of his life.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will; and I will tell you what else I will remember—that whenever they get up a bill of any importance and get it through the House without the consent of the Committee on Rules I will be willing to exclaim with one of old: "Now, Lord, lettest Thou Thy servant depart in peace." [Great laughter and applause.] I do not want you kindergarten Congressmen here, especially, to labor under any misapprehension as to what is going to happen to you, because the gentleman from Ohio has told you. If there is any work going on in your district that has to be continued to keep it from going to ruin you will get a little money; but if there is any new work, no matter how important or pressing, you are not going to get a cent for it, because they have not got the money to give. This blessed Dingley bill, the fount of every blessing, has produced a deficiency in the revenues to the amount of sixty or seventy millions of dollars. Now, I will ask the gentleman from Ohio——

Mr. PAYNE. Now, the gentleman wants to be fair.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. Which bill do you refer to?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Dingley bill. If you had a good tariff bill you would have had enough money to carry on these improvements.

Mr. PAYNE. Such a one as the Wilson bill?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. A revenue-producing bill, such as I would draw if I had the power to pass it.

Mr. PAYNE. The Wilson bill, under which we were running behind every year.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the Supreme Court had not held the income-tax provision unconstitutional we would have got plenty of revenue from the Wilson bill.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say to the gentleman that the income-tax provision would have not produced money enough to make a grease spot under the Wilson bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The only reason why it would not was stated by Mr. COCKRAN, of New York, who said that it would have made the wealthy men of New York get into the habit of committing perjury to keep the taxes from being collected on their incomes.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman is quoting from a distinguished Democrat upon that. To return to what I was just saying, as to there not being any deficit this year because there will be no river and harbor bill. It would not make any difference whether there was a river and harbor bill this year or not. All that money would not come out of the Treasury until the end of the fiscal year. In the last session we provided liberally for rivers and harbors, and that money is now being paid out of the money in the Treasury.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, let me ask you whether there is going to be any public-building bill reported this year? Now, answer that—yes or no.

Mr. PAYNE. I am not a member of that committee.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But you are the floor leader in this House.

Mr. PAYNE. If any such bill was brought in here as was brought in during the last Congress I should oppose it with the utmost vigor I have.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Gentlemen, I am sorry to see the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means resort to dodging in this debate. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. What does the gentleman mean?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What I mean is that you do not tell us frankly whether we are going to have a public-building bill or not.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why don't you know? [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. Because, like the gentleman from Missouri, I have not been consulted on that subject.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why do you not consult the Speaker and those gentlemen on the Committee on Rules?

Mr. PAYNE. So far as I am concerned, I am not interested in public buildings.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Oh, yes; that's it; you have got yours. [Great laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman is right about that. I commenced in a Democratic Congress many years ago.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You have been here a long time. When these kindergarten statesmen have sat here as long as you have they will get some too.

Mr. PAYNE. On that I had little experience, and if I were commencing with the "kindergarten class" I would not introduce a bill for a public building in my district.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What does the gentleman from Ohio say about a public-building bill? I want to get at the facts. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. On that question I am a single Member of the House of Representatives.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes, you are; and much more. You are one of the governing trio—one of the ruling elders.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I shall pass upon a public-building bill exactly as I pass upon other questions that come before this House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will ask you a leading question: Do you know whether it is the intention of the managers of this Congress that there shall not be any river and harbor bill, except as you have described, and there shall be no public-building bill at this session, in order to make buckle and tongue meet?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not understand either branch of that question in the affirmative. I have a suspicion on the river and harbor question, because of an interview given out by the chairman of the committee. As to the public-building question I have no knowledge, no information, and no belief.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to state to you that unless you gentlemen who want public buildings in your districts and improvements of your rivers and harbors break away from and overthrow this Republican machine in the House, which dominates in all things, you are not going to get any at this session of Congress. You can write that on the tablets of your memory now. This is an argumentum ad hominem. I have seen that game played two or three times since I have been here.

But I have been distracted somewhat from the propositions I was stating. While the Walker tariff bill was law there was great growth and prosperity, but the gentleman from Ohio says truly that while it was in force there came a war and there were great discoveries of gold; therefore the gentleman from Ohio concludes, or rather he wants this House to conclude, that the great prosperity described by Mr. Blaine as existing from 1846 to 1857 was produced by the Mexican war, the Crimean war, and the gold discoveries in California and Australia.

Mr. HEPBURN. I suppose you would say that the prosperity of a country might somewhat be measured by its foreign trade?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Possibly to some extent, but not very much.

Mr. HEPBURN. You have extolled the tariff of 1846, and have said that that tariff, continuing up to 1857, was the model Democratic tariff. I have here a statement showing the balances of foreign trade, from 1851, for eleven years; and during ten of those eleven years the balance of trade under that tariff was against the United States.

In the aggregate in the years when the balance was against us, the total balance against us was $442,000,000. In one year, the year 1858, the balance was $8,000,000 and some odd thousands in our favor. Now, under a Republican tariff, with the exception of the period when the Wilson tariff was in force, during eleven years including 1891 and following years, the balance of foreign trade in our favor was $2,692,000,000. So that under the Democratic tariff balances were against us to the aggregate of $442,000,000, while for the same period of time under a Republican tariff the balances were in our favor to the amount of $2,692,000,000. Is not that an indication that this latter system is the better system for the foreign trade?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Wait a minute before you sit down. I want to ask you a question, and then I will answer yours as fully as I can with the material at hand. Do you deny that statement of Blaine's that the years from 1846 to 1857 were years of great prosperity?

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, I would say this: I lived in this country at that time, but I lived upon what might be called the frontier, and I know that those were not times of prosperity for that part of the country. There was penury and want, but probably it was only that which was incidental to a new country.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I leave Colonel HEPBURN'S statement and Blaine's statement together, as far as that is concerned. You gentlemen can take your choice. Now, the question that you ask is in the main fair. When it is boiled down it is this: Do balances of trade indicate prosperity or not? That depends entirely upon circumstances. A nation may be very prosperous with a balance of trade against it. It may be very prosperous with a balance of trade in favor of it. Adam Smith stated that many years ago, and he is recognized as one of the leading authorities on political economy.

Mr. HEPBURN. You say that the business of the country may be prosperous and there may be general prosperity with a balance of trade against us. Now, during this period and for two or three years preceding, but during the time that that tariff was in force, eight hundred millions of gold were extracted from the mines of California.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That may be the amount. I do not remember the figures.

Mr. HEPBURN. Of that eight hundred millions of gold we sent out of the country four hundred and twenty-six millions to make good the balance of trade against us. Would you think that it would be possible for this country to have been prosperous at that period but for the accidental discovery of gold in California, with which the Democratic tariff had nothing to do?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. A part of that is true and a part is not. Holland has been one of the most prosperous countries for years, with the general balance of trade against it. So has Germany. So has England. Buying stuff does not impoverish a man if he needs the stuff and makes good use of it. So with a nation. While we were a feeble people and did not have any great factories of our own, while we were purely an agricultural people, the balance of trade was against us as a general thing, no matter what party was in power.

The balance of trade may or may not be a test of prosperity. I will put Mr. Blaine's statement as to prosperity of these years as a fact that can not be contradicted. There are two universally accepted standards of prosperity, increase of population and increase of wealth—not in aggregate, but by percentages—and the statistics show that, judged by percentages of increase of wealth and population, any one of the eleven years of the Walker tariff bill was more prosperous than any one of the nine years of the Dingley tariff bill. In no one of the eleven years of the Walker tariff did we increase in population as much in the aggregate as we have in any one of nine years of the Dingley bill, simply because 30,000,000 of people do not propagate as many children as 80,000,000 of people. In no one of the eleven years of the Walker bill did we pile up as much increase of wealth in the aggregate as in any one of the nine years of the Dingley bill, because 30,000,000 of people can not make as much wealth as 83,000,000 of people; and we now have all of these labor-saving devices which so much multiply the wealth-producing capacity of a people. But, judged by percentage in increase of wealth, we increased as much in any one year of the Walker bill as in any one year of the Dingley bill.

But what I started to say was that, granted the Mexican war and the Crimean war and the discovery of gold helped along the prosperity—and I do not desire to deny it—how does that apply to the present situation? Now, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] is no ordinary Congressman. He is a veteran statesman. He is one of the three or four great Republican debaters in this House. He claims that there has been greater prosperity under the Dingley bill than there ever was before. Every Republican claims that and that the Dingley bill produced it. But if the Mexican war and the Crimean war helped to increase the prosperity in 1846 and for the eleven succeeding years, how does it happen that the Spanish war and the Philippine war and the Boer war and the Russo-Japanese war and the greatly increased production of gold in recent years should not be credited with a part of the great prosperity that has come to the American people under the Dingley tariff bill? Why, as a sample, when the Spanish war began the very best mules in Missouri were selling for $75 to $100 apiece. These wars consumed the world's supply of mules. The consequence is that a good pair of mules in Missouri now sells for $300 to $500, and yet that, according to the Republican logic, is credited up to the blessings of the Dingley bill, which didn't have a bit more to do with it than had the ten commandments. [Laughter and applause.] Every man from the South who raises sugar and cotton knows that mules have gone up from the days when the Spanish war began; and if we had that great European war that they are talking about, the price of mules would go soaring out of sight. A man lives in my district who imports large numbers of Spanish jacks. He had ninety-seven left on hand in the spring of 1898, simply because he could not sell them at any price. He kept them over from necessity. One fine morning he awoke and found himself worth $100,000 in these ninety-seven jacks. The wars did it, not the Dingley bill.

Another thing about it: Suppose the gold production did help to bolster up prosperity from 1846 to 1847—and a man would be an idiot to deny it—what has helped to bolster up this prosperity but the new discoveries of gold that have brought $800,000,000 of gold into this country? That is how much more you have now than in 1896. Also a discovery of a new and cheap process of extracting gold out of the ore, which brought in another third of it in round numbers. When that process was discovered, it did not pay to work gold that did not run ten or fifteen dollars a ton; now you can work it with profit where it produces less than a dollar a ton. Where does the other third come from? I will tell you. In 1897 and 1898 and 1899 and 1900 we had the finest crops that ever grew out of the ground, and they had a crop famine in Europe and Australia, and those hungry people had to pay our farmers practically what they wanted for their products; so that it sent a stream of gold like the river Pactolus flowing into this country, into the arteries of commerce, quickening and fructifying the whole American commerce; and it is a poor rule that does not work both ways.

Mr. HEPBURN. Has the gentleman taken this into account? There is no extraordinary production of gold in the United States, nor has there been during the past eleven years—I mean the domestic production—in relation to the population and the business of this country as compared with the period that I name, from 1849 on. The production of gold then, in proportion to population and in proportion to business, was vastly greater than it is to-day; and then if the gentleman takes into account the production of gold outside of the United States will he explain to us how the United States would have benefited by that if the balance of trade all the time were against us? That foreign production of gold is valuable when customers of ours must send their gold here to liquidate or pay the balance that is against them in foreign trade.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman labors under the misapprehension all the time that if we send a dollar anywhere to buy anything we lose that dollar, and that if a man sends us a dollar over here for any purpose, no difference what we give for it, we gain a dollar. That is not true at all. On the contrary, if we give two dollars' worth of products for the foreigner's one dollar, we lose a dollar in the transaction.

Mr. HEPBURN. If the gentleman will allow me to correct him, I do not have that idea at all; but I have this idea, that if we send a dollar abroad to buy something that we do not make, we get the article that we want and the exchange is equal. There is no advantage to us save that which comes from that commercial transaction. But if we make that thing here at home, we not only have it but we save the dollar that otherwise we should have to send abroad, and that is what makes prosperity.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is not true either.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I just want to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Oh, one at a time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I know it is hardly fair to double team on the gentleman, but the difference between the man on the floor speaking to an entertained audience and an interloper is about even, two to one. I desire the gentleman to state now, in further illustration of conditions, he having spoken of the vast accumulation of gold which is now in circulation in the United States, supposing that a law had been passed in 1897 making free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, how much of the gold coin that has come from these extraordinary productions—which I by no means admit—would, in his judgment, be circulating to-day in the United States? And in that connection will he tell me what would have made any difference in the circulating medium of the United States and that of China, where there is no gold coin, and in Mexico, where there is no gold coin? Is it not a fact beyond the possibility of discussion that as rapidly as that gold was produced in the United States it would have sought occupation in gold-standard countries to the utter exclusion of the circulation of gold in the United States, and is not that the inevitable and irrepealable law of this proposition?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will answer first the question of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]. It is true that it is entirely foreign to a tariff discussion, but he has done me the honor to ask it, and I shall do him the honor to reply to it. If William J. Bryan had been elected President of the United States in 1896, and there had been an honest and persistent effort, as there would have been, to have bimetalism established all over the world, everywhere on the civilized globe to-day a silver dollar would be worth a gold dollar. The Republicans in 1896 did not declare honestly, squarely, and courageously in favor of the gold standard. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] had, I think, a great deal to do with the writing of the money plank and of the Republican platform of Ohio in 1896. He was there or thereabouts when that remarkable and ridiculous document was prepared. They went to St. Louis with that platform to nominate McKinley on it. I will give any man in this House the best hat that Stetson can make if he will take the money plank of the Ohio platform of 1896 which they carried to St. Louis with them and tell me what it means. You can read it right side up and wrong side up and catawampus, like somebody said he read Blaine's letter from Genoa, and you can not tell to save your life what it means. But when they reached St. Louis Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE and the eastern gold bugs got hold of the trimmers down there and rammed part of the gold standard down their throats; but they did not declare unequivocally in favor of the gold standard. They were too smart for that. They said, "We are in favor of the maintenance of the present gold standard until"—until what?—"until bimetalism, the coinage of gold and silver, can be secured by international agreement."

Mr. GROSVENOR. Do you not think that was a pretty good ram?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think that is one of the most skillful devices of American politics—a most successful bunko game. I will tell you what that enabled the Republicans to do, and I heard them do it with success. They went to the country on a proposition that they were actually better silver men than we were. Brother MCCLEARY shakes his head. Maybe he did not do it, but they did it all over the country, and they roped in enough free-silver votes to elect William McKinley President of the United States, and then, when they had elected him, he appointed an international commission, composed of Senator Wolcott, Adlai E. Stevenson, and some statesman from Boston whose name I do not recall, to go to Europe and effect this international agreement; and those three men came very near performing a miracle over there. They persuaded England to agree to go into the coinage of silver again, and just the very minute the news reached this country that England was about to agree to it, Lyman J. Gage, who ratted to the Republican party in order to get office, the Secretary of the Treasury, had himself interviewed (or interviewed himself), in which interview he stated that that commission did not represent the Administration and did not represent the people of the United States, and that was the last of that great confidence game. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] That was just exactly it. If the gentleman from Ohio has any lurking suspicion in his head that I have any apologies to offer for supporting William J. Bryan in the campaigns of 1896 and 1900 he might as well disabuse his mind of it now. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt about it, and I have no doubt about the gentleman's willingness to follow him in 1908.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will if he is nominated, sure as you are living. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. And I think you will follow him to the same result. But will you not kindly answer the question put to you?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, I am answering.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, I did not know it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I can not answer it in a sentence. When I think of Bryan and think of the men who pulled him down, I recall the splendid lines of Shakespeare—

> An eagle, tow'ring in his pride of place,
> Was by mousing owls hawked at and killed.

[Applause.]

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. One at a time. I will get through with the two veterans before I tackle the juniors. [Laughter.] My further answer to the gentleman from Ohio is this: If there had been an honest effort made to secure international bimetalism there would never have been any gold exported out of this country, unless somebody had peculiar necessity for the gold in the arts and sciences; that it would have put the gold and silver absolutely on the same basis the world over.

Mr. GROSVENOR. There is no doubt about that, but has the gentleman from Missouri ever in the last twelve years noticed any tendency among the nations of the world to agree to bimetallism?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Never heard the slightest whisper about it since that international commission was hamstrung by Lyman J. Gage. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The condition of affairs right now demonstrates that we were right in our contention in 1896—that is, in the main contention. What was the main contention? Democrats said that the more money you had the more prosperity you had. We say it now. Sixteen to one was a mere incident to the main proposition. Republicans said that you had money enough. Now, if you did have money enough, what did you want with any more? And why go around exploiting yourselves?—because you have $800,000,000 more gold in the United States than you had then? You have also more prosperity than you had then, and the prosperity of the country keeps pace with the volume of the currency in the country. Now, to answer, as far as the contention of the gentleman from Iowa is concerned. Our output of gold has increased. Of course I could not bring all the documents and statistics in the country here to-day, and never expected to be asked that question in a debate on the tariff, but I affirm, without any fear of successful contradiction, that our output of gold has increased in the United States since 1896. We are also the chief beneficiaries of all the gold that is dug out of the Klondike region. So much for that.

Mr. WATSON. The gentleman has described the great joy with which he followed Mr. Bryan in 1896 and in 1900, and I wanted to ask him whether or not he did not with equal joy follow Grover Cleveland in three Presidential campaigns?

And with which one now does the gentleman stand? And what is the particular brand of Democracy that the gentleman now has in the bottle out of which——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Champ Clark Democracy. [Great laughter.] The very best brand that there is in the country. [Laughter.]

Mr. WATSON. I want to ask this question: In 1897 the gentleman from Missouri made a speech on the floor of this House in which he said that if he had his way about it he would destroy every custom-house in the United States.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; I think I said that.

Mr. WATSON. On the 28th——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am not going to have that 9-year-old speech of mine incorporated in this speech. [Laughter.]

Assuming for the sake of argument that I was a free trader in 1897, and am one yet, for that is what the gentleman's questions mean, I want to ask this entire Republican side if it is a crime to be a free trader?

Mr. MAHON. Yes; in this country.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will pump something into the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] very suddenly. [Laughter.] He is the very man I have been looking for. Now, listen. I will read this paragraph, without telling the gentleman from Pennsylvania who wrote it:

> The repeal of the salt tax was an especial favorite of his. He was perfectly right in attacking the tax, and deserves the greatest credit for the persistency which finally won him the victory.

The man who wrote that paragraph is a free trader pro tanto, is he not?

Mr. GROSVENOR. No, sir.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Oh, the gentleman from Ohio knows who wrote it. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] answers that the man who wrote that paragraph is a free trader. The gentleman from Ohio is too smart to be caught in the trap. Who wrote that paragraph?

Mr. MAHON. I did not.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know the gentleman did not; but a much greater man did. Theodore Roosevelt, President of the United States.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, the gentleman will——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Wait until I get through with this Pennsylvania brother and I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to add something to the hilarity of the occasion before I go, and I must go in half an hour.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, I am glad of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Just yield to me for one moment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. All right.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman who wrote that paragraph in his youthful days is the present President of the United States, and the statement appears in the Statesmen Series of the Life of Thomas H. Benton. Benton made a great reputation at one time by attacking the tariff on salt, and the President indorses his conduct and gives him great credit for it. I, as a stand-patter of the most intense character, indorse what the President says in that writing, and extend it over as an additional testimonial in favor of Thomas H. Benton. Why? The production of salt in the United States at that time was so small that a tariff upon salt then would have been, and was substantially the same as a tariff upon coffee or tea would be now. And therefore Mr. Benton could very well be a protectionist, which he was not, and oppose a tariff on salt, as I have always, although a protectionist, opposed a tariff on tea and coffee. That answers the whole of my friend's very adroit and very forcible proposition—until it is answered. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, now, General, I want to say something to you. I am not authorized to speak for President Roosevelt.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Neither am I.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am certainly glad to hear it. [Laughter.] Colonel Roosevelt is my personal friend, and I am his. I wish him well. The gentleman from Ohio comes in here and undertakes to do by proxy for Colonel Roosevelt what Colonel Roosevelt will never do for himself, and that is to plead the baby act. Cowardice is not among his sins. He wrote this paragraph about Thomas H. Benton, into which trap my friend from Pennsylvania walked, when he declared that to be a free trader in this country is to be a criminal. Therefore, according to the logic of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON], President Roosevelt is a criminal. [Laughter.] There is no Republican in this House who will dare to stand up here in the face of this assembly and categorically declare that Colonel Roosevelt is a criminal, because if he does, President Roosevelt will cut off his supply of "pap," and a Republican Congressman without "pap" is lost in the world. [Renewed laughter.]

The gentleman from Ohio got himself into a hole before he sat down. He says that he is a double-back-acting "stand-patter." I deny it. He voted for the Cuban reciprocity business. He is going to vote for this bill, which is free trade piecemeal. I congratulate the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and the rest of them on getting a part of the way to a reasonable tariff bill. The gentleman from Ohio said that he was like Colonel Benton when Benton fought the tariff on salt—that he was against the tariff on tea and coffee. Why, there is no parallel between the two cases. We make salt in this country in abundance. All we have to do is to go to work and boil it, or dig it out of the ground in train-load lots. There is no tea or coffee grown in the United States for commercial purposes, and there is no parallel between the two cases.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Why, the gentleman ought to be fair, and he has been very successful in that respect, but this act of Benton's was prior to the manufacture of salt commercially in the United States.

It was even prior to the production of Turk Island salt, and we were compelled to import our salt from Liverpool and other points of that character. There is no dispute about that.

Is there no difference between the tariff upon tea or a tariff upon any article that is produced mostly in a foreign country and another article that is produced in this country?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. God made salt nearly as plentiful as the air we breathe and the water we drink; and man has wickedly levied a tariff tax upon it. Even the pagan Romans knew better than that. A standing order to the Roman army was that they should never levy a tribute of salt on a conquered people. I wish I had time to make a speech on Thomas H. Benton and the work he did in putting salt on the free list. For years in the Roman senate Cato, no matter what was the subject of his speech, wound up with "Carthago delenda est"—"Carthage must be destroyed." And no difference what the subject of debate in the American Senate Colonel Benton lugged in the subject of protected salt. He was one of the greatest Democrats that ever lived, and the speeches which he delivered in the United States Senate upon this subject will amply repay perusal, even at this late day, for the learning they contain and which at last put salt on the free list. When he had accomplished his purpose so pleased was he that he said, in his pompous way, that he imagined he heard the flocks and herds on a thousand hills bellowing out their love and gratitude to him for it. No doubt they would have done so could they have understood his splendid labor in their behalf.

In conclusion, I want to ask you all a question. If Thomas H. Benton deserves the highest credit for putting salt upon the free list, as Colonel Roosevelt said he did, would not I deserve the highest credit for putting salt back on the free list? I have introduced a bill in five or six Congresses to do it, and I intend to introduce it into every Congress as long as I stay here, so help me God, until I triumph as did "The Great Missourian," whose high career constitutes one of the priceless heritages of the imperial Commonwealth which he loved so well and served so nobly. If Benton deserved the highest credit for doing that, as President Roosevelt says he did, why would not Mr. WILLIAMS, or Judge DE ARMOND, or any other man in this House, deserve the highest credit for putting any other prime necessity of life upon the free list?

These gentlemen have lured me far afield by their numerous, ingenious, and interesting questions. Let us return a moment to the consideration of the present crisis in our tariff affairs.

What sort of a modus vivendi is it that Secretary Root is endeavoring to induce Secretary Shaw to enter into with Germany? Why, if the papers are to be believed, it is to be nothing more than a systematic juggling with invoices of German products imported into this country from Germany—a sleight of hand performance by which invoices from that country are to be rated lower than they should be in order to placate Germany temporarily and tide the Republican party over the rocks during this session. In the meantime, we are to be amused with this maximum and minimum toy. Then Congress having done nothing, absolutely nothing, to permanently improve the situation and having adjourned, the Republicans will play another stupendous confidence game by going to the country with gorgeous promises of what they will do by way of tariff revision at the short session—in which great game they will be all things to all men, hoping thereby to carry the Congressional elections. This trick may prove successful, but I do not believe that it will. The people are not all fools.

Gentlemen, I have exceeded by very much the time that I expected to occupy. I thank the House profoundly for its courtesy and its kindness. This speech is somewhat disjointed, because it was not written out beforehand and because there have been ceaseless interruptions. I have tried to be fair about it. I have denied no Member a chance to interrogate me. I hope that this day's work will open up a discussion that will be the cause and beginning of a wider discussion in the country, which will do one of two things—it will either drive the Republicans of the agricultural districts into electing outspoken Republican tariff revisionists here, or else the next House will be a Democratic House. Truth is mighty and will prevail. If I have contributed even "the widow's mite" to the approaching triumph of a righteous cause, the three hours which I have consumed have been profitably spent. I have an abiding faith that when the eyes of the taxpayers of the land are opened to the situation they will not longer stand for the monstrosities of the Dingley tariff bill. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FORDNEY rose and was recognized.

Mr. BISHOP. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan may be allowed to conclude his remarks without limit.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BISHOP] asks unanimous consent that his colleague, who has been recognized by the Chair, may be permitted to speak until he shall have concluded his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I am in this matter placed in a rather peculiar position. I wish it to be understood at the beginning where I stand on this measure. I will try to make myself clear in what I have to say about it, so that there will be no misunderstanding as to what my views are. I am opposed to this bill for many reasons. In the time given me I will try in a plain, businesslike way to explain why I oppose this bill.

In the first place let me say I understand the measure is called a Republican measure. From the wording of the bill and the effects which may arise from it no human being, in my opinion, could understand whether it is a Republican or a Democratic measure. I have always understood that the Republican party, to which I belong, stood for protection to American industries. I believe that the President of the United States is a protectionist, and that many Republican Presidents before him were protectionists. I believe that the platforms adopted in national conventions by the Republican party have declared for protection to American industries. To bear me out in that statement, I want to ask the time of the House while I read a portion of the Republican platform adopted in the national convention in St. Louis in 1896. It is the plank in that platform that refers particularly to sugar.

We condemn the present Administration for not keeping faith with the sugar producers of this country. The Republican party favors such protection as will lead to the production on American soil of all the sugar which the American people use, and for which they pay other countries more than $100,000,000 annually.

I believe that the Republicans in convention that framed that plank in this platform meant what they said, meant that if the people of this country would return that party to power they would carry out their pledge. Have they done it? Let me read you just a little of the platform adopted in 1900 by the Republican party in convention assembled:

We renew our faith in the policy of protection to American labor. In that policy our industries have been established, diversified, and maintained. By protecting the home market competition has been stimulated and production cheapened. Opportunity to the inventive genius of our people has been secured and wages in every department of labor maintained at high rates—higher now than ever before, and always distinguishing our working people in their better conditions of life from those of any competing country. Enjoying the blessings of the American common school, secure in the right of self-government, and protected in the occupancy of their own markets, their constantly increasing knowledge and skill have enabled them to finally enter the markets of the world.

Further on in that platform let me read to you what was said about reciprocity. I believe that this measure is claimed by its friends to be a reciprocity measure. Oh, I have become so disgusted with the term reciprocity, as used by the Republican party—not the Democratic party—since I have been a Member of this House that I can not believe for an instant that the friends of this measure and the friends of Cuban reciprocity ever knew what reciprocity meant as referred to by James G. Blaine and William McKinley.

We favor the associated policy of reciprocity, so directed as to open our markets on favorable terms—

Now, listen, please, and then compare it with the effects of this bill—for what we do not ourselves produce—

That is reciprocity; that is what was meant by the Republican party at that time when they mentioned reciprocity—in return for the foreign markets.

That is reciprocity as I understand it, gentlemen. Reciprocity does not mean that we propose to open our markets to the goods of foreign countries to come in here without duty on competitive articles. That is not what was meant by the term "reciprocity." By opening our markets to the raw sugars of the world, produced by the cheapest labor on earth—is that reciprocity, when we can produce that product on American soil? I say "No."

Let me read to you what our President, Theodore Roosevelt, said in his letter of acceptance in 1904, and then, if you please, I will ask the friends of this measure to reconcile it with the principles in this bill, if they can.

Here is what the President said in his letter of acceptance in the last campaign:

The one consideration which must never be omitted in a tariff change is the imperative need of preserving the American standard of living for the American workingman.

I will show you later on what this bill proposes to do in the standard of wages for the American laboring man:

The tariff rate must never fall below that which will protect the American workingman by allowing for the difference between the general labor cost here and abroad, so as at least to equalize the conditions arising from the difference in the standard of labor here and abroad—a difference which it should not be our aim to foster in so far as it represents the needs of better educated, better paid, better fed, and better clothed workingmen of a higher type than any to be found in a foreign country. At all hazards and no matter what else is sought for or accomplished by changes of the tariff the American workingman must be protected in his standard of wages—that is, in his standard of living—and must be secured the fullest opportunity of employment. Our laws should in no event afford advantage to foreign industries over American industries. They should in no event do less than equalize the difference in conditions at home and abroad.

That is what our President said in his letter of acceptance before entering upon the campaign that elected him President of the United States, the position he now holds. Let me read you what he further said:

It is a matter of regret that the protective tariff policy, which during the last forty-odd years has become part of the very fiber of the country, is not now accepted as definitely established. Surely we have a right to say that it has passed beyond the domain of theory, and a right to expect that not only its original advocates, but those who at one time distrusted it on theoretical grounds, should now acquiesce in the results that have been proved over and over again by actual experience. These forty-odd years have been the most prosperous years this nation has ever seen, more prosperous years than other nations have ever seen.

Again he says:

Every class of our people is benefited by the protective tariff. During the last few years a merchant has seen the export trade of this country grow faster than ever in our previous history. The manufacturer could not keep his factory running if it were not for the protective tariff. The wage-worker would do well to remember that if protection is "robbery" and is to be punished accordingly, he will be the first to pay the penalty.

Taking all in all what I have read from our Republican platform and what I have read from the letter of acceptance by Theodore Roosevelt, I still, my friends, cling to the high protective tariff as the safeguard of American liberty, and I believe the President of the United States stands with me on that principle.

Now, let us see if this bill becomes a law, whether or not we are carrying out the pledges that we made to the people of this country upon which every Republican in this House stood and pledged himself to the letter of the law. When I accepted the nomination in my district, my friends, I pledged myself to these platforms, and I propose to stand there until the last ditch, if I am the only man on this side of the House to stand in that line.

It is my opinion and my belief—and I am candid and firm in that belief—that we can not tear down this protective wall which the Republican party has put around American institutions and let in the product of foreign cheap labor without injuring that industry, if it is a competitive article. Let us see whether or not the sugar from the Philippine Islands and the sugar from Cuba is a competitive article with something made in this country. The year of 1883 was about the time the sugar industry in this country began to grow. It ran along gradually and slowly until 1897, when William McKinley called together Congress in extra session for the purpose of repealing the Wilson bill, and put in its place a high-protection tariff measure. The Dingley bill provided that sugar coming from foreign countries, 16 Dutch standard, or 96 per cent pure, should pay a duty of 1.68½ cents per hundred pounds. By the provisions of that bill the American sugar manufacturers of the United States had that much advantage over the cheap-made sugar in foreign countries. That tariff stood there as a stone-wall against the foreign nations of the earth. That stimulated the sugar industry in the United States, and right in the State of Michigan, which I have the honor to represent in part in Congress, the first sugar factory began to make sugar from beets grown in the fields of Michigan.

In 1898 the first factory in that State turned out some sugar. Under the belief that the Republican party meant just what it said in its platform, and that that party so long as it remained in power was going to carry out its pledge, capital became confident and sugar factories began to spring up all over our State, and by 1900 we had 17 magnificent sugar factories in that State. That industry kept going on so rapidly that the average man could not keep pace with it, but the very instant the Republican party introduced into Congress a so-called "Cuban reciprocity measure," immediately the hope of every business man in the State of Michigan who had a single dollar invested in that industry vanished. They hesitated, and said: "What does our party propose to do? It has given encouragement to this industry. We have invested our money—all we had, in many insances—and now by the adoption of Cuban reciprocity and the removal of 20 per cent of the $1.68½ duty that stood there as a stone wall we can readily see that the great sugar trusts of this country are going to have an advantage over us, and with their $90,000,000 and not one drop of warm human blood flowing in their veins we know that the inevitable must come unless the Republican party will stand by its pledges made in 1896 and again in 1900." And imagine their surprise! When Cuban reciprocity was introduced, and the Committee on Ways and Means gave notice that the hearings would be given, from all over the United States came delegations representing the beet-sugar industry and representing the cane-sugar industry in the South, and earnestly registered their protest against the passage of that measure. But what was the use? It was a packed jury, and a conclusion had been reached before the bill was introduced. They pleaded for mercy. They said they had their money invested. They said that the sugar trust could import into the United States from Cuba raw sugar, pay the Dingley rate of duty, pay the prevailing price for the raw sugars in the markets of the world, pay the cost of refining, and put refined sugar upon the market for just about what the manufacturer could produce sugar from beets for and put it on the market.

Ever since the first pound of sugar was produced in this country from beets and cane the sugar trust has fixed a standard of prices, and it receives for sugar made from cane 10 cents a hundred pounds more than the sugar-beet manufacturer can get for his sugar; and no matter whether the price in the market is high or whether it is low the manufacturer of beet sugar dare not undersell or oversell the sugar trust in any market of the United States. No merchant—no wholesale grocery merchant in the United States—can buy from the sugar-beet manufacturers in this country his supply of sugar for the twelve months in the year. There is a time during the twelve months when every merchant in the United States must go to the sugar trust for his sugar, and the sugar trust has laid down this rule, and they have carried out this rule to the letter: "If you buy more than so much sugar from the beet-sugar manufacturer, by the gods, you can not have a pound of sugar from us when beet sugar is exhausted." I know a case in the State of Michigan where a wholesale grocery man in the city of Detroit had an interest in a sugar factory in the Eighth district, at a town called Caro. The sugar trust served notice upon him that he must not use over a certain amount of sugar coming from his own factory, and if he did, not a pound could he get from them when his sugar was gone. Oh, what kind of competition is that? If in your opinion Cuban reciprocity or this Philippine free-trade measure would help to stimulate the markets for the sugar trust under such circumstances, is there a man within the sound of my voice who would support such a measure? If so, he is not a friend of mine. But, thank God, gentlemen here have the right to think as they please and act as their good judgment dictates. If they differ with me, it is their privilege. But if there are any gentlemen in the House of Representatives, or in either end of this Capitol, who would support a measure that will drive out of existence one single industry in the United States to the benefit of the trusts, I would like to know who he is. Is there a man here who would do it? I believe not. But let us see whether or not this bill does that, in effect. I have stated to you before that when Cuban reciprocity became a law the sugar trust, if they should receive the benefits of the 20 per cent reduction, could put upon our markets raw sugars imported from Cuba at a third of a cent per pound less than sugar could be produced from beets. Mr. Willetts, of Willetts & Gray, sugar statisticians, of New York, one of the greatest experts among the statisticians and mathematicians of this country, stated last spring before the Committee on Ways and Means that at that time the sugar trust was purchasing raw sugar from Cuba at 13 cents a hundred pounds below the Hamburg or London prices, and the refined sugar produced by the American Sugar Refining Company and the Arbuckles was at that time being sold and put upon our markets for 11 or 12 cents a hundred pounds above the price obtained for refined sugar in Hamburg and in London.

If that is so, my friends, the 20 per cent reduction given to Cubans for their sugar in that Cuban reciprocity measure amounted to 33.7 cents per hundred pounds. Then Mr. Willetts shows conclusively that the sugar trust had absorbed 24 cents of the 34 cents, while at the same time every man, woman, and child within my hearing or out of my hearing in this country knows that the consumer paid 1 and 2 cents a pound more for his sugar than he did before the enactment of the Cuban bill. How do you reconcile those differences, my friends? I can not do it other than by the fact that the sugar trust absorbed, as I stated, two-thirds of that reduction and the poor devil of a Cuban got but one-third. Now, to bear out the statement that this is possible, that Mr. Willetts was correct, a public announcement was made in the newspapers of this country on or about January or February, 1905, that the sugar trust had declared a dividend—an annual dividend, mind you—of 26 per cent on their $90,000,000 of capital, and that 26 per cent did not include the profits on coffee and in the banking business, in both of which they are heavily engaged. Is that any good excuse? Why, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] yesterday lightly spoke of the correctness of Mr. Willetts's statement the other day before the Committee on Ways and Means, giving him credit for being a very fine and scholarly gentleman, but doubting his figures. Let me say to you, if you read the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means that took place just before the holidays, and then listened to the gentleman's remarks from the State of New York made yesterday, or read his remarks, and you will find that he discredits, or attempts to discredit, the statements made by every man who appeared in opposition to this measure. The gentleman referred to Mr. Hathaway, a gentleman employed by several sugar factories in the State of Michigan to go to the Philippine Islands and investigate the sugar situation, so that at the beginning of this Congress, knowing that this bill would again be brought up for consideration, they might be in possession of some facts to meet the committee's recommendations. Mr. Hathaway is a resident of my home town, an estimable gentleman. Not one word in the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee appears to discredit the honesty and integrity of that gentleman, yet Mr. PAYNE yesterday in his remarks on the floor of this House referred to him as representing $5,000,000 of capital going to the Philippines to purchase sugar land. Mr. Gove, another gentleman who happened to be in the Philippines at the same time Mr. Hathaway was there, gave his testimony or statement, and the question was asked him by Mr. SMITH of Michigan, a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, "What did you hear as to what Mr. Hathaway represented himself to be in the Philippine Islands? Did you hear him claim that he was a representative of millions of dollars and that he was over there for the purpose of buying sugar plantations and building factories?" His answer was, "I traveled for days and days and weeks with that gentleman and never heard such a statement until I heard it here in the committee room." I take Mr. Hathaway's statement as being absolutely honest and fair. I believe what he has to say. I would believe him as quick as any other honorable gentleman whom I know. I know of no instance where Mr. Hathaway, either in speaking of the Philippine Islands or of the sugar industry of this country, ever made a misstatement, unless it happened to be a clerical error. All men are apt to do that, but I know of none, even clerical, made by that gentleman.

In the first place, let me say that when Cuban reciprocity was introduced, in 1900, there were 52 sugar factories in the United States, and they were springing up so fast, as I have stated before, that the average business man could not keep track of the progress of that industry. Fifty-two factories produced sugar from beets in 1900, and the report of the Agricultural Department shows that there were 34 more factories either under construction or contemplated in the United States at that time; but upon the agitation of Cuban reciprocity what happened, my friends? To-day we have but 54 in the United States, and I will give their location to you and their slicing capacity. I want to call your attention to this for the reason that I want to show you how much money the American people put in that industry upon their faith in the Republican party, pledged by their platforms, to which I have referred. California has 7 factories to-day in operation, as shown by statistics. Their slicing capacity daily is 9,100 tons. Colorado has 12, with a daily slicing capacity of 9,300 tons of beets. Idaho has 3, with a slicing capacity of 3,000 tons. Illinois has 1, with a slicing capacity of 350 tons per day. Michigan has 17 factories, with a slicing capacity of 11,150 tons daily; Nebraska, 2, with a slicing capacity of 1,450 tons per day; New York, 1, slicing 600 tons daily; Ohio, 1, slicing 400 tons daily; Oregon, 1, slicing 400 tons daily; Utah, 7, slicing 4,000 tons daily; Washington, 1, slicing 500 tons daily; Wisconsin, 3, slicing 1,700 tons daily. The total number of factories running in the United States, year 1905, 56; total slicing capacity, 42,000 tons of beets; total investment of capital in these factories now in operation, about $42,000,000.

When Cuban reciprocity was introduced in the House, Michigan factories sent such a delegation down here to oppose that measure, composed of such representative and honorable business men that the sugar trust was simply awed. They immediately sent a representative to the State of Michigan and purchased an interest in some of the best factories in that State in order to hush up that opposition. And one man from Bay City, Mich., came down here, and I had the pleasure of accompanying him to the White House to appeal to Theodore Roosevelt to urge Congress to withdraw Cuban reciprocity. He appealed to the President most earnestly, but got no relief.

In a few days the trusts got hold of him and purchased a half interest in his factory. In the course of a week or ten days afterwards he came back here, sent in his card, asking me to meet him in the hall and go to lunch with him. He begged me to accept the 20 per cent reduction. Why? Because he had been purchased by Havemeyer, and it was to Havemeyer's interest to have that bill become a law. When I found what he wanted of me, I begged to be excused. I could not turn my coat as quickly as all that. To-day, my friends, let me say to you the sugar trust has purchased, through a representative, a trustee, in order that they might not be known in the transaction, an interest in eight or nine of the best factories in the State. One, at Kalamazoo, has, I understand, been torn to the ground. If I am wrong in that, I hope my colleague [Mr. GARDNER] will correct me. They became interested in another factory, at Oscoda. After that factory had been built it was found that there were not enough farmers in that immediate vicinity to raise beets for the factory and that the land was not the best adapted for the raising of beets in the State; and the consequence is that factory has been torn down or is now being demolished. They purchased another factory, known as the "Michigan Sugar Factory," at Bay City. Its doors are closed and nailed up, never to run again.

They purchased an interest in the Saginaw Sugar Company, in my own town—a magnificent structure, a monument to our town or to any city in the land, that cost something like seven or eight hundred thousand dollars. To that factory they obtained absolute control or title, and within ninety days' time they put upon its roof 150 men, tore it to the ground, and nothing but the smokestack remains. God forbid, gentlemen, that you and I or any other set of men should ever pass a measure to help such a hydra-headed, damnable corporation as that!

Why do they not want American beet-sugar factories to run? I will tell you why. They have sufficient capacity in their refineries to-day to refine all of the sugar that all of the people in the United States consume and 20,000,000 of people more without adding one dollar's worth of machinery to their present plants; and with this beet-sugar competition out of the way they can buy the raw sugar in the markets of the world, bring it into the United States, refine it, and hand it out to the consumer at just what price they see fit to charge for it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will my friend from Michigan yield for a question. I want to get some information on this subject.

Mr. FORDNEY. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I wish he would tell me the number of factories controlled by what is called the "sugar trust," as well as the number of factories that are not so controlled. In other words, I want to find out how many factories are owned by what is known as the "sugar trust." After the gentleman tells me that, will he tell me to what extent the sugar trust dominates the beet sugar?

Mr. FORDNEY. I thank the gentleman for the inquiry. I can give him that information only as applied to the State in which I reside. I am not acquainted with the fact as to how many factories they are interested in in the United States.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Are they interested in beet-sugar factories?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir; in beet-sugar factories. I am talking about beet-sugar factories. Does the gentleman ask me what they control?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to find out how many factories they own. Do they own any beet-sugar factories, and to what extent does the sugar trust dominate beet sugar?

Mr. FORDNEY. I know of no factory they own absolutely in the United States. I will give you the names of the factories in which they have an interest in the State in which I live; some other gentleman may be able to answer your question as to other States later on. Now, as to the factories in which they are interested. They are interested in the following factories in the State of Michigan: The Saginaw Sugar Company, the Caro Sugar Company, the Bay State Sugar Factory, the Alma Factory, a factory at Croswell, another factory at Sebewaing, and a third interest in a factory at Menominee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What is the output of the factories?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will give you the whole annual output of the beet factories. The factories in Michigan have a slicing capacity of 11,150 tons of beets per day. In other words, to build a sugar factory in this country it costs $1,000 a ton for the slicing capacity of that factory. A factory that would slice 600 tons of beets per day costs $600,000. I will read the complete list a little later. Let me go on with my remarks in reference to the conditions.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I thank the gentleman for this information.

Mr. FORDNEY. What would you say that the average American citizen, capitalist, laboring man, and farmer would naturally expect from the Republican party after he had read their platform, which I have put in my remarks here? Would he not naturally suppose, as I have said, that they meant it and that he could with confidence go on with his business industry and be protected against foreign manufacturers and the foreign cheap labor of the world? Certainly that would be the natural conclusion he would arrive at. I never had a dollar invested in a sugar factory. I would not want it to-day. I would not take sugar stock in any factory within the State in which I live at 50 cents on the dollar of its actual par value unless my friends of the Republican party would awaken from this sleeep, from this forgetfulness, that they are going through and say to the public, "We meant what we said. We will repeal the Cuban reciprocity and we will shut out from American markets every pound of raw sugar made by foreign cheap labor and foster that home industry in the United States until we produce on American soil every pound of sugar that the American people consume." [Applause.]

For the benefit of some of you gentlemen let me show you how that industry went with leaps and bounds on the supposition that they were going to receive protection from the Republican party. I have gone back as far as ten years in statistics, and I find that in the United States in 1895 there were 20,092 tons of sugar produced from beets; one year later, 29,220 tons; in 1897, 37,536 tons. In 1898—watch, now—from the time the Dingley bill became a law, in which bill there was a provision placing a high tariff on foreign cheap sugar coming into our markets and protected that home industry to the extent that American capital could make an investment and feel secure in their protection and that they were going to make a profit in the business—in 1898 there were produced 40,398 tons. In 1899, for some unknown reason—a bad year, I presume, for the raising of beets—the crop dropped off to 32,407 tons; but in 1900 it jumped up to 73,000 tons; in 1901, 77,000 tons; in 1902, 163,000 tons; in 1903, 195,000 tons; in 1904, 208,000 tons; in 1905, 209,000 tons; and this year, 1905–6, 285,000 long tons, or 300,000 short tons, in round numbers; and this, my friends, with about the same number of factories we had in commission in 1901.

Some criticism has been made about the figures given by the manufacturers of beet sugar in the State of Michigan and throughout the United States. The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means yesterday referred to the profit made from a by-product, pulp. He said that one institution—I know the one he had in mind; it is located at Alma, in the adjoining county to my home county—had experimented with beet pulp, and he hooted at the idea that it was an experiment. He is mistaken about this not being an experiment. There are only four such institutions in the United States. That company spent $9,800 in getting rid of that pulp. They were obliged under our State laws to in some way dispose of it so that it would not be a detriment to the sanitary conditions, and they erected a plant, a dry kiln, at an expense of $65,000, if I remember rightly, to dry this pulp and put it upon the market as a food for stock; and one of the proprietors of that factory told me yesterday that they about broke even last year on that institution.

Some criticism has been made as to the amount of molasses sold for the production of alcohol. Mr. PAYNE referred to a Mr. Humphrey, who appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means, and he spoke lightly of the answers that Mr. Humphrey gave when he was asked what they received for molasses. His answer was that they received about $2.50 per ton, about what it cost to run the molasses into cars and dispose of it.

There are but three institutions in the whole United States making alcohol from the sirups from sugar extracted from beets. Two of them are in the State of Michigan, and it is a godsend to the manufacturers in that State to find a market for that bitter sirup. The gentleman from New York said that the sugar factories were interested in that alcohol plant. I want to correct him. That is a mistake. There is not a sugar factory in the State of Michigan that has any interest in that alcohol plant. It is owned by a separate corporation, which pays to this Government about a million and a quarter of dollars a year in revenues, at a dollar and ten cents per proof gallon, for their alcohol that they make from that bitter sirup that comes from the beet-sugar factories. They have sold considerable of their output to the Government at $1.26 per gallon, or 16 cents a gallon above the revenue upon it.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Upon what theory does the Government tax alcohol made from the beet and not tax alcohol made from the destructive distillation of wood?

Mr. FORDNEY. Perhaps I can not give you the correct answer, but it is my understanding that the alcohol made from the sirup from beets is much the same as grain alcohol, while the wood alcohol is a fuel alcohol.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Let me ask one further question for information. What is the net selling price of that alcohol—the wholesale selling price—above the tax?

Mr. FORDNEY. Sixteen to 20 cents a gallon. The gentleman interested in the factory told me the maximum price that he had ever received above the tax was 20 cents per gallon, and it often sold as low as 12 cents per gallon.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Do the beet-sugar factories sell their refuse at a fixed price?

Mr. FORDNEY. The beet factories sell to this alcohol manufacturing institution their sirup after extracting all the sugar they can from it. They sell the residuum—what is called the "bitter sirup"—to the alcohol factories.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. And that alcohol when produced and refined is good for fuel and light and power, just the same as grain alcohol would be?

Mr. FORDNEY. While I am not an expert on alcohol, I think that is the case.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. And it can be produced at a cost of 12 cents a gallon?

Mr. FORDNEY. That was not what I said. I said they had sold it for 12 cents a gallon above the $1.10 tax upon it.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I meant aside from the tax on it.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; in other words, at a total wholesale price of from $1.22 to $1.30 per proof gallon. They have sold it as low as 12 cents and as high as 20 cents above the $1.10 revenue tax per proof gallon.

Mr. PAYNE. Did the gentleman say they sold the alcohol for 20 cents?

Mr. FORDNEY. Above the tax.

Mr. PAYNE. The records of the Navy Department show that they sold it at 5 cents a pound, and there are 6.76 net pounds in a gallon of alcohol, which would be about 34 cents a gallon. The records show that that was the price at which it was bought from this distillery up there.

Mr. FORDNEY. I fear the gentleman confuses the proof gallon with the wine gallon. The difference between them will make the difference in the figures, I think.

Mr. PAYNE. Why, the gentleman must know that the Navy Department buys the proof gallon, of course.

Mr. FORDNEY. Well, I have the statement from Mr. Smith, the proprietor of the factory.

Mr. PAYNE. I have it from the Navy Department, that bought it.

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not care what the Navy Department said. I believe Mr. Smith, for I know he is an honorable man.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not care what Mr. Smith says. I believe the Navy Department.

Mr. FORDNEY. All right. My colleague [Mr. LOUD] offers a suggestion. Was that the price at the factory or the price laid down to the Government at some point with freight added?

Mr. PAYNE. I really do not know.

Mr. FORDNEY. I did not believe that you did know.

Mr. PAYNE. The freight would be so infinitesimal that it would make very little difference. The freight on 6.76 pounds, which is the weight of a gallon, would be very small.

Mr. FORDNEY. I leave it to gentlemen to judge for themselves.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know where it was delivered, but I will say to the gentleman that I presume it was delivered to the Government at the place where the smokeless-powder factory is located.

Mr. FORDNEY. I have no reason to dispute the figures given by the gentleman from New York, if those figures represent the delivered price.

Mr. PAYNE. I presume that is the fact, and I give the gentleman the benefit of my assumption in the case.

Mr. FORDNEY. All right. As the Irishman said when the other fellow called him a liar, "We will lave it so." [Laughter.] He did not want to have any further dispute, and neither do I, because the gentleman's last statement explains the discrepancy in his figures.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not understand that the gentleman makes any direct application of that. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, not at all; it was only a joke to suit the occasion. Now, I do not know whether my friends are afoot or on horseback. I do not know whether they are on a Republican horse or on a Democratic free-trade horse, but I know where I am. I am not on a free-trade horse. I am not as much confused as some other gentlemen are about this bill. A story is told of my friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] when a young man practicing law. There was an old darky in his town that was accused of stealing chickens. He looked around and finally found the gentleman from New York, who was willing to undertake his defense. When he came into court, the judge said to the darky, "Are you the defendant in this case?" The darky didn't exactly understand what was meant, but he said, "No, Judge." Pointing to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], he said, "That is the defendant; I am the man that stole the chickens." Now, I believe I am going to contend in this case that I and my constituents are the defendants. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. I think my friend from Michigan must be indulging in some of the poetry that hangs around this question. Where did he get the story?

Mr. FORDNEY. From a storybook. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. I never heard it before.

Mr. FORDNEY. I don't know but that the gentleman from New York wrote it. Now, let me show you what this industry amounts to in this country and particularly the State in which I have the honor to reside. In the State of Michigan this year there were somewhere from seventy-five to eighty thousand acres of land planted to sugar beets, from which were sold by the farmers 640,000 tons of beets delivered to the beet-sugar factories in that State.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. Certainly.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Is it not a fact that most of these factories now rent the land direct from the farmer and cultivate the soil themselves?

Mr. FORDNEY. No. I know of but one factory in the State of Michigan that owns any land on which beets are raised. They are all contracting for planting except a portion of the beets raised by one concern at Owosso, Mich. It may be the case in other States, but not in Michigan. From those beets this year there was produced about 67,200 long tons of sugar, which, at four and a half cents a pound, would amount to $6,775,000. That is in the State of Michigan for that crop this year. We only consume some ten or fifteen thousand tons in the State more than we produced this year.

Let me show you what was produced. In the United States this year there were from 280,000 to 300,000 acres of land planted to beets—call it 280,000 acres—and the average yield of beets per acre was 10 tons in the United States. In the State of Michigan it was considerably less this year because we had a bad season, a great deal of rain in the month of July, which retarded that crop very much. That 280,000 acres produced 2,800,000 tons of beets, and the average price of those beets paid to the farmers by the factories in the United States was five and a half dollars per ton, or $15,400,000, quite a sum to go to the farmers. They were raised by 70,000 to 80,000 farmers in the United States. The average planter plants only about 4 acres, on an average, throughout the whole United States. Fifteen million four hundred thousand dollars to the farmers, and about 300,000 tons of sugar extracted from those beets, which, at four and a half cents per pound, would amount to $30,000,000. Information was given to the Committee on Ways and Means that the cost of the production of sugar in the State of Michigan this year was $3.90 per hundred pounds. For easy figuring, let us take last year's cost—4 cents per pound. That cost is all money paid to the farmer for labor and for money paid to the laborer in the factory and for supplies consumed by that factory, produced by American labor somewhere in the United States. You may go back to the records where Mr. Havemeyer gave testimony before a committee of the Senate, where he said that the cost of refining foreign imported sugar in his refineries—the minimum cost was 37 cents per hundred pounds and the maximum 62½ cents per hundred pounds. Let us take 50 cents as a fair average. One-half a cent per pound American labor gets for the sugar refined by these two great institutions, and if we produced that sugar on American soil American labor would get eight times that much on the average amount produced by the refineries in this country. And you must understand that all the refined sugar, practically all, that we consume in this country, that is not made from beets, is refined by the two great refining companies—the Havemeyers and the Arbuckles.

Labor received, for the sugar refined by those two companies, from seventeen to twenty millions of dollars for the amount refined last year, and if that sugar had been produced from beets or from cane grown in the fields of the United States labor, as I have said, would have received eight times that amount, or nearly $150,000,000. In the name of God, men, is it your aim to do something for the American farmer and the American laboring man? If so, put this bill as quick as God will let you into the wastebasket and repeal Cuban reciprocity and add another cent a pound to the present Dingley rate of duty on foreign imported sugar, and this industry in this country will run up like a mushroom in the night. [Applause.] I am going to tell you about how much sugar is consumed by the different people throughout the world. I show it to you to convince you that we are among the people of the world who consume the most sugar. In the United States the amount consumed per capita is about 73 pounds. I heard it given by Mr. Welborn to the Committee on Ways and Means that it was 71 pounds.

Mr. KEIFER. Seventy-seven.

Mr. FORDNEY. Seventy-seven. I thank the gentleman. I have plenty of reason to doubt the correctness of the statements made by Mr. Welborn, a gentleman brought by the Government to Washington from Manila, in the Philippine Islands, to testify as an expert as to the cost of production in the Philippine Islands. After reading all he has said before the Taft Commission in the Philippine Islands and what he said here and putting two and two together, so help me God, if it were me I would not have paid the freight on it. The United Kingdom consumes about 90 pounds per capita; Switzerland, 63 pounds; Denmark, 52 pounds; Russia, 11 pounds; Austria, 18 pounds; Belgium, 22; France, 24; Germany, 28 pounds; the Netherlands, 31 pounds; Spain, 11 pounds, and Italy, 7. So that it is shown there is only one country on the face of the earth that consumes more sugar per capita than do the people of the United States, and with American vim and Yankee push and plenty of capital and an abundance of soil why not foster that industry on American soil and produce all of the sugar that all of the people of the United States consume and keep that one hundred to one hundred and twenty-five millions of dollars that we send annually abroad for foreign sugar? Why not do it? I am ready and willing to lend my helping hand.

All I ask is sufficient support here, and I believe time and time again it has been proven to us that this can be done if we will only give as much protection to this industry as has been given to the iron and steel industry in this country and to the tin and to every other principal industry in the United States. [Applause.] We imported last year about the following amounts, and I will give you the different countries from which we brought it. We imported about 100,000 tons from Porto Rico, and the statistics show that they produced 145,000 tons there. From the Hawaiian Islands we imported from 350,000 to 370,000 tons. From Cuba and all other countries, 1,750,000 tons. We produced from cane in this country about 300,000 tons and from sugar beets 300,000 tons, or in the neighborhood of a total of all of about 2,800,000 tons, and of this 1,750,000 tons which were imported last year, let me show you what statistics say about the amount that came from Cuba. I give the calendar year, not the fiscal year. One million two hundred and thirty-two thousand five hundred and eighty-nine tons came from Cuba. At the time Cuban reciprocity was before this House for consideration it was claimed by the friends of that measure that there never could be produced enough sugar in Cuba to affect the market in the United States. At the time that bill was first introduced they produced about 615,000 tons in Cuba. The opponents of this measure claimed that they had sufficient lands suitable for the production of cane in Cuba to produce about one-half the sugar used by the entire world, and I think everything has been proven to carry out the correctness of that assertion. Cuban reciprocity so stimulated that industry in Cuba that the output has run up from 615,000 tons in 1900 until the estimates furnished this year show that they will produce 1,300,000 long tons, all of which must come to the United States, except what little is consumed by the Cubans themselves; and, mind you, there are no purchasers for Cuban sugar in this country or for the sugars from any other country in the world but two men, H. O. Havemeyer and Arbuckle. God knows I should regret exceedingly if all of my eggs were in one basket that would be obliged to be sent to those two gentlemen to purchase them without any further competition.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman knows that all of the refined sugar that is consumed in Cuba is controlled in its manufacture by the two gentlemen whose names he has just mentioned, does he not?

Mr. FORDNEY. I think so.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I know it.

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not doubt the gentleman.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I know it, I have been there, so therefore the consumption there does not affect the price of sugar in this country at all, because whatever enters into consumption of sugar in Cuba is manufactured by the same gentlemen who are engaged in this country in beating down the price of your sugar and the price of the sugar down in the country in which I live.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. Now, gentlemen, I believe just what the gentleman says. I believe that he is absolutely correct, and I have every reason to believe that he is strictly honest. I want to say as briefly as I possibly can that the benefits of Cuban reciprocity do not go to the Cubans, as the opponents of that measure contended at the time that bill was being considered in this House and as my friend [Mr. PAYNE] in a few brief remarks here in February last, just before Congress adjourned, attempted to show that Cuban reciprocity had so stimulated the foreign market for our American goods that it was an absolute and complete success. I was not on the floor when the gentleman made these remarks. I am not accustomed to talking too much, I believe, and I did not attempt to answer it——

Mr. PAYNE. No; I guess the gentleman could not have been here from what he has said, or he would not have made his statements.

Mr. FORDNEY. I read the remarks of the gentleman from New York the next day.

Mr. PAYNE. I did not state it was a complete success. On the contrary, I stated it was not, but I said it was not such a failure as your people were representing, and then I gave figures and did not characterize it. That is very different from your statement.

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not want to misquote you, and that was my recollection, and if I have misquoted you I beg your pardon and wish to correct it. But let me tell you I want to show to you it was an absolute failure and in no way a success, and I can prove it to you, and if not I will yield. Before proceeding further, a gentleman sends me a note—from the gallery, I believe, or from the hall—who is interested in an alcohol factory at Bay City, about which we were talking, as to the cost or price received for his alcohol, and I will read what he states:

The contract with Navy Department, referred to by Mr. PAYNE, was 5 cents per pound. This is about 29 cents per wine gallon, or 16 cents per proof gallon, free of tax.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, the gentleman will remember in the hearings that his friend, Mr. Humphrey, stated they received for the alcohol from 30 to 40 cents a gallon. That was his statement.

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me say to you Mr. Humphrey is in no way interested in that institution. This information comes from its proprietor.

Mr. PAYNE. He pretended to know about it.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, yes; that might be, but he might have been a little off in his figures.

Mr. PAYNE. I think he is usually a little off, and he might have been in that. He was the sugar expert who was testifying, and he may have been a little off.

Mr. FORDNEY. But not an alcohol expert. He was really not a sugar expert. My friend Humphrey is a lawyer—one of the best in the State—an estimable gentleman, and an able man, who would like to come to Congress, and that is the only thing on which we differ. [Applause and laughter.] Now, after our dealings with Cuba, let me show you whether or not this Cuban reciprocity was a success or a failure. In the start let me say to you I was opposed to that measure. I fought it bitterly. I was ready and willing, because I thought the interests of my constituents were at stake, to believe that I could afford to override the decision of the gentleman in the chair when the amendment was offered to that bill, which the Chairman declared was not germane. I was one of the forty-two or forty-seven insurgents who have been referred to who joined with our Democratic friends on that side of the House in overruling the decision of the Chair, adding an amendment to Cuban reciprocity that sent it to its fate. It failed. The value of our exports to and imports from Cuba for the calendar year of 1895 were as follows. The imports from Cuba for 1905 were $51,718,880. Our exports for that year were $9,498,000. I will not give the odd dollars, as it does not amount to anything. In 1896 we imported $24,703,000 worth and sold them $7,296,000 worth. In 1897 we took $16,233,000 worth from them and sold to them $9,308,000. In 1898 we took $18,321,000 and sold them $10,750,000. In 1899 we took from them $29,668,000 and sold them $24,861,000. In 1900 we took $31,747,000 and sold them $26,934,000. Remember these two last dates, because I want to refer to them. In 1901 our imports from Cuba jumped up to $46,633,000 and our exports amounted to $27,007,000. That was in 1901. In 1902 we took from them $48,619,000 worth and sold them but $23,061,000 worth. The last year before Cuban reciprocity, 1903, we took from them $57,228,000 worth and sold them $23,504,000, or $3,500,000 less than we sold them in 1901. This is the year referred to by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. PAYNE. Was not 1901 the year we were occupying Cuba?

Mr. FORDNEY. I think it was.

Mr. PAYNE. Of course, that made a great deal larger sale for American goods.

Mr. FORDNEY. I agree with the gentleman. I think that is right. Now, let me go further. The first year under Cuban reciprocity we took from them $74,950,000 worth and sold them $32,644,000 worth. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] last spring, in referring to that, showed those figures, in order to demonstrate that it was at least a partial success, as he says. In 1905, the first ten months of the year, we took from Cuba $87,001,000 worth and sold them $36,276,000 worth, or a little over $2,000,000 more than we sold them last year, only a natural increase of our foreign trade that we should expect with them, which would be a natural increase with any nation on the face of the earth with our increase of exports all the time.

Now, let us say that Cuban reciprocity did increase our sales with Cuba from $23,000,000 to $32,000,000 last year, while our imports ran up from $48,619,000 in 1902 to $87,001,000 for the first ten months of 1905. Let us see what happened in the way of loss of revenues to us. I have here the figures. The sugar that we purchased last year, during the calendar year, from Cuba was 1,232,589 tons. That 20 per cent benefit we gave them as a reduction of the duty, 20 per cent below the Dingley rate of duty, amounted on that sugar alone to $9,304,567.84. And for the sugar imported into the United States for the first ten months of the calendar year of 1905, 1,100,000 tons. That loss of duty to us amounted to $8,303,680, or in the twenty-two months, $17,608,247.84. All this for the measly seven to ten or twelve millions dollars' worth of business with the Cubans.

Oh, great Scott! If I had a boy 10 years old at a 10-cent department counter that could not make a better trade than that I would spank him so that he would have to eat his meals from the mantel for a week. [Laughter.] The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], when talking for the Cuban reciprocity measure, and when his republicanism or his devotion to the tariff measure was questioned, said: "I am a protectionist. I have been taught protection from my father's knee." I do not doubt it. He got started all right. How is he going? How is he running? If that father could come back to-day and read the speech made by his son on the Dingley bill, he would pat him on the back and say "Well done, my son." When he would read his speech on the Porto Rican bill, again he would say, "Well done, my son." But if he could rise up and hear his speech made on Cuban reciprocity, he would hesitate and look surprised. But if he could have been here yesterday and heard that gentleman assail our protective policy and defend his free-trade measure, he would say, "You young scoundrel, SERENO, what has come over you?" [Great laughter.]

Now, let me go further and show you what we gained by Cuban reciprocity, my friend. We passed that measure as a reciprocity measure. That bill provided that Cuban imports coming into this country should receive admission at a rate of duty 20 per cent below that fixed by the Dingley law, provided that goods coming from the United States into Cuba should be admitted into Cuba at 20 per cent less than that on any other goods of any other country in the world. That was reciprocity as it appeared and as it said, but it was reciprocity on competitive articles generally, which is only an abortion for reciprocity, a subterfuge for reciprocity.

Let us see how much benefit the farmer gets. My friends, I have taken from the Cuban tariff some items that would affect the American farmer. Let us see how much the American farmer has been benefited by that measure. Poultry and American game going into Cuba from this country paid before reciprocity 8.81 cents per kilogram.

Six weeks after the passage of our Cuban reciprocity measure and its acceptance by Cuba the Cuban Congress revised their tariff law, and, if I have the dates correctly, on the 14th day of February, 1904, they raised the duty on all imports going into that island. So that when they gave us the benefit of the 20 per cent reduction here is what we pay compared with what we paid before the Cuban reciprocity became a law, and I ask you if it is a square and fair deal?

As I have said, poultry pays 8.01 or 8.1—I have confused the figures there, but it is 8.1 or 8.01 as against 8.32. That first item was a misprint. Meat in brine, 100 kilos, paid $2.80 before, and pays $2.912 now. Beef and pork, $2.80 before; $2.912 now. Lard paid $2.80, and it pays $2.912 now. Tallow paid $2. and pays $2.08 now. Bacon paid $4, and pays $4.16 now. Hams and shoulders paid $5.50, and pay $5.70 now. Beef, fresh, paid $5, and it pays $5.20 now. Mutton paid $4.50 then, and pays $4.68 now. Oh, an excellent deal for the American farmer! Goodness, how proud he is of it, eh?

Pork paid $4 then, pays $4.16 now; eggs, $5 then, $5.20 now. Rice—now, remember rice was something they wanted. The southern people were raising rice; the Cubans were obliged to have rice, because their labor gets but little else than rice and wind and atmosphere—rice, $1, now 72 cents. They gave the benefit of 20 per cent and some more, but when it comes to rice flour—"No, sir," they said, "we are not going to let you put in the finished product on that article;" and where it paid $2 before, it pays $2.08 now. Great help to American farm labor! Oh, yes. Flour of oats, $1.20 before Cuban reciprocity; $1.248 now. Beans and peas, $1.10 before, now $1.144.

I may tire you. I know the friends of this measure are getting awfully tired. Eggs, 70 cents before; 72 cents now. Potatoes, 50 cents before; 52 cents now. Oh, what a lovely deal for the Irish! [Laughter.] Clover, $3.60 before; $3.60 now. Flax, 82 before; 82 now. Timothy, $2 then; $2 now. All farm products, mind you. Swine, $1 then, and $1 now; sheep, $1 then, and $1 now; goats, $1 then, and $1 now. Various other animals the same. Petroleum oils, $3.50 then, and $3.50 now. Horses, $2 to $15, according to the quality and value; $2 to $15 now. Agricultural machinery they were obliged to have, and they gave us the benefit of 20 per cent on agricultural machinery. We actually did get the benefit of the provision of that measure on agricultural machinery. It was $10 then, and $8 now. Wheat, 25 per cent—they were almighty hungry there and wanted wheat and they gave us a little more than the 20 per cent. Corn, 30 before, 27.3 now. Rye, 40, as against 41.6 now. Barley, 50, as against 52 now. Oats, 40, as against 41.6, and bran, 25, as against 26 cents. An excellent deal for the American farmer! It is true our farm products—all these articles I have named—go into the islands at 20 per cent less than articles of the same kind from any other country in the world. But they bought these articles before Cuban reciprocity, and they would buy them now if that measure had never passed.

Mr. PAYNE. That being the case, and we get a reduction over any other country, the more they raise the duty the more the differential, is it not? For instance, they double the duty and the amount of differential would be doubled?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. You get in that much cheaper than anybody else?

Mr. FORDNEY. We get in under 20 per cent less duty than anybody else.

Mr. PAYNE. If they raise the duty to the people then there is a greater difference between the duty and the 20 per cent?

Mr. FORDNEY. Concede that you are absolutely right—and

I will do it for the sake of the argument—why, in the name of God, did not Theodore Roosevelt ask Congress to act at once and raise their duties in proportion? Would not this be a square deal, and tax the Cuban sugar an equal amount after giving them 20 per cent reduction, and make them pay just what they paid before? And you would see how quick they would get off their perch.

Mr. PAYNE. I think that the Senate, under the lead of the gentlemen who were advocating the same side of the question as the gentleman is now advocating, put into the treaty or into the law a provision whereby we were to keep the same duty on sugar, so far as Cuba was concerned.

Then, I want to remind the gentleman of another thing. He was boasting about helping beat the bill we had before the House. The bill before the House gave the differential in favor of our people of 20 per cent ad valorem upon the value of the goods, which would have been a much greater difference than what the treaty gave. So, if anybody is responsible for the small growth of which the gentleman complains in our trade with Cuba, and the amount we are selling down there, it seems to me it is not the man who introduced the bill into the House and who tried to put it through who is responsible, but the gentlemen who succeeded in defeating the bill in the House after trampling on the rules of the House.

Mr. FORDNEY. For God's sake, do not connect me with any such proposition, or charge me with advocating any proposition that ever reduced one penny the duty on sugar. Since I have been a Member of this House I have opposed all of them, and I am going to continue to oppose them, and I regret exceedingly that the gentleman from York State [Mr. PAYNE] does not agree with me that it is our plain duty to protect our own people. He said yesterday it was our plain duty to protect the little brown people over in the Philippines, who, he says, are as innocent and inefficient as 12-year-old children in this country, Our plain duty is first to the American laboring man and the American farmer, as I understand it. I am trying to do what I think is my plain duty at home.

Now, let me go back for a minute to compliment our President for the position that he takes in his letter of acceptance on the question of the difference between American and foreign labor, maintaining a price that will furnish to the American laborer a fair living.

I have talked longer than I intended to, but I will conclude what I have to say in a few minutes.

Several MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman from York State [Mr. PAYNE] said yesterday that there was a difference of 1 cent a pound on sugar coming in from the Philippines, as compared with the sugar from other countries—Cuban sugar, we will say—of 16 Dutch standard. I read an article from the Weekly Statistical Sugar Trade Journal, prepared by Willetts & Gray, of New York, dated December 28 last:

Muscovadoes in New York, $3.12½ per hundred pounds; other sugars, $3.62½.

This shows that there is a difference of but one-half cent per pound. Comparisons are made here for the past three years, and for the fourth year there is only 15 cents difference. I want to say that I believe the gentleman from York State [Mr. PAYNE] is biased, and that he came as near to hitting the bull's-eye on that proposition as he does on any other proposition connected with this Philippine free-trade bill. It has been shown by abundant evidence, which I have not the time to quote at length, in the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means that the cost of the production of sugar in the Philippine Islands is about three-quarters of a cent per pound, laid down for water shipment at Manila; and the gentleman from York State yesterday stated that the freight was 30 cents per 100 pounds to New York, which I believe he said included insurance. He is not so very far out of the way.

Mr. Hathaway, who gave the matter very careful consideration, states that for the last two or three years it has ranged from 21 to 27 cents, the average price being about 25 cents per 100 pounds, or a quarter of a cent a pound. Now, if the statement made by Mr. Welborn and by Mr. Heyl, the foreman of the government farm in the Philippines, is correct, that sugar can be produced and laid down at Manila for water shipment for three-quarters of a cent a pound, the freight at 25 cents a hundred pounds makes it $1 per 100, or 1 cent per pound on board ship in New York. Figuring the duty on 96 per cent pure, which is about the duty on Philippine sugar, the duty would be $1.2638 per hundred pounds, and the cost of refining, 50 cents, as I have stated before, would make Philippine sugar, figured at cost and put upon our market refined ready for the consumer, at 2.7638 cents; in other words, in round numbers 2¾ cents per pound. Now, give the Filipino half a cent per pound profit and you have 3¼ cents. Make the difference as shown there of half a cent a pound, that would be 3¾. Now, if the sugar trust absorbs that product, which there is no doubt in my mind they will do, because they never let anything get away that they can get their claws on, they can get sugar from the Philippine Islands under modern improved methods for sugar production and put it upon our market at a quarter of a cent per pound less than it can be produced from sugar beets.

This testimony has been given over and over again. I have an abundance of it here to show that the labor in the cane fields, the maximum price, is 16 cents a day in money and food combined. Mr. Welborn states that he has found the Filipino an efficient employee, and as good a teamster, as good a man to plow in the field, as any American he has ever employed. Time and time again through the hearings it has been stated by the gentlemen who went there for the purpose of obtaining information that the wages paid in the Philippine cane fields were 15, 16, and 17 cents a day, and in many instances, notwithstanding the statement made by Mr. Taft, who said that there was no such thing as peonage in the islands, it has been shown here by the testimony of two or three gentlemen that there are to-day many slaves upon the sugar plantations. They cited this one instance where a poor woman has been recently relieved from bondage, who has to-day a family grown up of her own, who was given to her master when she was 7 years old to pay a debt of 75 pesos ($37.50), which these people advanced to bury her parents.

Mr. Gove said that he called upon another Filipino, a magnificent specimen of humanity, and he said to him: "What are you doing here?" "I am working for this planter." "How long have you worked here?" "All my life." "How much do these people pay you?" "I don't know; I never had any money in all my life; he gives me all the rice and sugar I want and all my family wants, and I am satisfied. I am happy and I don't want any more." His clothing consisted simply of a shirt and nothing else. That is the kind of labor these people have there to-day in the cane fields of the Philippine Islands, and this bill proposes to bring down the American labor to that level. Oh, in the name of God, do not think of it for a minute, gentlemen; do not slaughter the rights and privileges of your neighbors at home for such miserable, contemptible labor as that! We never want to associate with them. You do not want them in your family; I do not want them in my family. They say this is American territory, and the only claim the friends of this measure are making for this bill is that it is American territory and we must help the little brown fellows. That is all. I beg of you, gentlemen—I beg of you in the name of all that is reasonable to come forward and carry out your pledges as set forth in our platforms, and crush out such measures as this, that would bring degradation to American labor, the American farmer, and American capital. I thank you. [Great applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLMSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 3—the Philippine tariff bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 6, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

REPORT OF SPECIAL IMMIGRANT INSPECTOR MARCUS BRAUN.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I move to discharge the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization from the further consideration of the following privileged resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask for its adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution No. 76.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor be, and he is hereby, respectfully requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to send to the House of Representatives, at his earliest convenience, the reports, or copies of the same, heretofore made to said Department of Commerce and Labor by Special Immigrant Inspector Marcus Braun and dated on or about August —, 1904; June —, 1905, and July —, 1905.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, is that a privileged motion?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, the resolution is now privileged. It was introduced by me on the 13th of December last, and the committee has not acted upon it. So it is now privileged under the rule.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to the resolution; but I make the point of order that it is not privileged.

The SPEAKER. It occurs to the Chair, after hearing the resolution read, that the motion is privileged.

Mr. MANN. It is not a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, it is a resolution of inquiry. It inquires for reports by way of information. This information is very desirable. There should be no objection.

Mr. MANN. It is a resolution directing the sending in of a report. I have no objection to the consideration of the resolution, but it does not seem to me that it is a resolution of inquiry. If that practice should prevail the House might require the sending in of all kinds of reports to be printed.

The SPEAKER. It occurs to the Chair that it is in the substance of a respectful request that amounts to an inquiry. Sometimes the House directs; but this is a request that, if not incompatible with the public interests, he send to the House of Representatives at his earliest convenience, etc.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, let me say to the gentleman from Illinois that I am informed the Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor has no objection to the resolution. The immigration question is a pertinent matter, and will come before Congress ere long for discussion. We should have these reports of Mr. Braun. I am told they contain much valuable data and information on this important question. The people should know their contents.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. SULZER. And I know there are quite a few Members of Congress who want to know what Inspector Braun has reported in regard to matters of immigration between Austria-Hungary and other European nations and this country. This is the only way we can get this information, and we are entitled to have it.

Mr. MANN. Well, I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The only suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois is as to whether the motion is privileged.

It occurs to the Chair under the rule that it is, the time having expired within which the committee is required to report. The question is on the motion to discharge the committee.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to, and that that motion lie on the table.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

SUPPRESSION OF TRAIN ROBBERIES.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 349) for the suppression of train robberies in the Territories of the United States and other places, and for other purposes, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I would state that the chairman of that committee is perfectly willing that this should be done.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent for change of reference of the bill referred to as requested. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3) to amend an act entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," approved March 8, 1902.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill No. 3.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. OLMSTED in the chair.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from Connecticut proceeds, I ask unanimous consent that he be allowed to conclude his remarks without interruption.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Connecticut may be permitted to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

There was none, and it was so ordered.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, it has occurred to me during the progress of this debate that perhaps one cause of some opposition to this bill has come from a misunderstanding of the general conditions of the Philippine Islands. It was my intention to make a carefully prepared speech for my own constituents as well as for the Members of this House on the subject of tobacco alone, and I have prepared that and shall give it to you by and by; but previous to that it seems to me that there would be a better understanding of the whole situation if I should as briefly as possible review the general conditions in the Philippine Islands The red line on the map before us shows the latitude and longitude of the territory which was ceded to the United States by Spain under the provisions of the treaty. It covers an area about 1,250 miles in length and about 400 to 500 miles in width. The actual land area of the Philippine Islands, according to the census—and there is a slight difference of about 5,000 square miles between the census and the Gazetteer—is 127,000 square miles, which is 7,000 square miles more than the area of Great Britain, which supports 40,000,000 people, and about 20,000 square miles less than the Empire of Japan, where from forty to fifty millions of people are living. There is a very wrong impression in regard to the physical geography of this country. Two gentlemen were at my house the other evening who had the idea that the country resembled to a large degree Illinois, Iowa, and Nebraska.

Far from that, it resembles and follows out almost exactly the physical geography of Japan, where it is well known that only 14 per cent of the area is tillable, and where, after two thousand six hundred years of recorded history, they have only succeeded in cultivating 12 per cent, notwithstanding that it has a density of population that probably exceeds any other country on earth and has had an intensive cultivation that is not equaled anywhere in the world. The tillable area of these islands is 9½ per cent of the total surface. The question was asked here yesterday or the day before where that fact could be found. I will state for the benefit of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] that it will be found on page 181 of volume 4 of the Philippine census.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Certainly; at any time.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman at this time, because I expect to take that question up myself if I have an opportunity to speak. I simply wish at this point to ask the gentleman if it is true that at that page in the census or anywhere else in the census there is a statement to the effect that there are only 9½ per cent of the lands in the Philippine Islands that are tillable?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. It is given 9½ per cent as agricultural lands.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, yes; I will explain that later.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Furthermore, the gentleman will find on the same page of the census that this is not mere guesswork, the work of somebody sitting at Manila guessing at the area of the tillable lands of the Philippine Islands, but it is a report from each separate province, made by the people in the province itself. Out of the whole forty-nine provinces—I think it is forty-nine—these reports are brought together and consolidated, and they show that there is agricultural land in these islands to the extent given, nine and a half per cent, as constituting the tillable area, and that of this only 4½ per cent, after three hundred years of occupation by civilized people, ever has been under cultivation. Right here let me say in regard to the one particular island where eight-tenths of all the sugar comes from, Negros, and from the province of Occidental Negros, 21 per cent of that is estimated as agricultural land, and 46 per cent of that 21 per cent is already under cultivation. In this archipelago there are said to be about 3,000 islands. Of course that covers everything—pinheads of rocks that come up out of the sea and everything of that kind, but the principal islands, the productive islands, the exporting islands, are the only ones I desire to talk about.

The island of Luzon is eight times the size of Connecticut and has four times the population.

The island of Mindanao is seven times the size of Connecticut, and has one-half of the population. On all of the easterly side of this group of islands the mountians come down direct to the sea without intervening shore as a rule. On the westerly side is where the arable land is found. The mountains come down at a distance from the seashore of from 3 to 20 miles, and there is where the cultivable area of the island is found to a very large extent. Now, the best demonstration of the truth of the statement that 9½ per cent only of the islands is agricultural land is shown by the fact that two-thirds of the entire population of the archipelago live within 3 miles of the seacoast, and the interior to a very large extent is unoccupied because it is uninhabitable. Take, now, the population. I have had this map colored to show the location of the different kinds of population in the islands. The brownish-gray color represents that portion of the island inhabited by Christian people, civilized people. The yellow represents the portion of the island inhabited by wild tribes, absolutely uncivilized. Igorrotes and Negritos are in this section of the country—savages, head-hunters, 250,000 of them, within a hundred and twenty-five miles of Manila—and more than that, the Negritos are over here in the Mariveles Mountains to a quite considerable extent—absolutely wild people within 50 miles of Manila.

This summer while in Manila they had an industrial parade, and one feature of that parade were eight of those Igorrote savages. They were clothed with a gee string and a smile, and carried a bow and arrow and nothing else. They were absolutely wild savages, and yet you see right in the heart of the principal island of the group that 250,000 of these head-hunters live today. The portion colored green is occupied by Moros, semi-civilized, half savage Malays, Mohammedans, slavery and polygamy prevalent among them—a mild form of slavery, but slavery nevertheless—and there are 250,000 of these in that island, and yet this is the island of which we have heard so much of its wonderful fertility and the danger that is going to come to the United States if this bill is passed, and it becomes possible to cultivate it all with tobacco, sugar, cocoanuts, hemp, rice, etc. No white man would be safe for a moment in this section of the country outside of a town or village where a garrison was stationed.

Mr. SULZER. There is where the head-hunters live.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. They live out here in this island in the section colored yellow. Now, another thing; a curious fact about this country is this, perhaps not bearing on this case, that this is the only nation or people in the world in history that ever has been converted from Mohammedanism to Christianity. It was done by the Catholic Church, and they are entitled to great credit for doing it. Now, desiring to proceed in order I take up the question of——

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire if the gentleman objects to questions?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Not at all.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Do you regard the census report from that territory occupied by Moros as of value in connection with the raising of tobacco and sugar there?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I will take it up by and by when I come to the question of the localization of the various industries of the country. Take the question of the education of those people. I find by the census report that of the whole mass of the population, which is about 7,600,000, 700,000 of them are wild people and 6,900,000 Christian people, that of these people, including only those from 10 years of age and upward, 20 per cent can read in some language, but taking the whole population together, about 14 per cent can read in some language. There is no Filipino people in the sense in which we speak of an American or English or German people. There are eighty-seven different tribes and peoples, speaking from fifty to sixty different languages, and as a rule it is impossible for them to communicate with each other from island to island and from a part of one island to another part. It is as it would be if Washington and Baltimore were utterly disconnected and their citizens could not converse or communicate with each other in a language which they could mutually understand. There are no highways for intercommunication. The only railroad in the island now runs from Manila to Dagupan, at the foot of the Lingayan Gulf. There are practically no highways. There may have been here and there one, a short one built by the Spaniards, and a bridge built here and there by the Spaniards, but so far as real communication from one part of an island to another is concerned there were no methods provided and none existed.

The people of this valley could not converse or communicate with the people on the seashore across the mountains. I said that about 14 per cent of these people could read in some language; in Spanish only 3 per cent of the people; a few in English, but generally in their tribal dialect, of which, as I said, there were some 50 or 60 varieties. Under such circumstances you could not expect a very high order of intelligence among them. Now, I do not wish by saying this to throw any discredit upon the people of the Philippine Islands. There are probably 1½ or 2 per cent of those people who are the very best product of the universities of Europe and America—as brilliant, as polished, as cultivated, and as refined as you will find anywhere in the world. I am simply speaking of the great mass of the people, who have been denied all the privileges of civilized life by reason of the conditions under which they lived.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Will the gentleman permit a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] yield to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. DIXON]?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Will the gentleman point out the island of Negros?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I will come to that in a moment.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Also will he tell us the journey the people who went to the Philippine Islands last summer took?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I should have stated that the black line shows the trip I had the privilege of taking with other Members of Congress through the islands, and you will see it included all of the principal islands and ports in the archipelago.

Now, gentlemen, we have a great problem on our hands in the Philippine Islands, and I am going to call your attention to just one feature of it. Three centuries ago, when the Spaniards went there and took possession of the islands, there were half a million of people. To-day there are seven and one-half millions. They have increased fifteen times over—through wars, through pestilence, bubonic plague, cholera, insurrection, smallpox, and every conceivable thing that one could think of to prevent the increase of population; and yet they have increased fifteen times over. And I want to say to you gentlemen that, in my honest judgment, instead of having a problem of a Philippine Archipelago, with seven and one-half million people to deal with, in fifty years from now you will have a population of twenty-five millions if stable government and peaceful conditions continue under our administration of the government. So the problem is really much greater to deal with than that which we think we have on our hands to-day.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Yes.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I am curious to know how those savages back in the mountains, away from the seashore, subsist. Do they live by fishing and hunting, like our Indians, or how?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. The peculiarity of any tropical country—that is, of any which I have ever visited, and especially so of this—is that work is not required for subsistence if one is willing to accept the kind of food which can be taken out of the ground or plucked from the trees. It is a marvelous factor, and it should be very carefully considered when you come to calculate upon the future productions of those islands. There is a population there that for 300 years has never been prompted by necessity to economy, to industry, and to any of the virtues—we call them virtues in a civilized country—that obtain in the United States. I believe it is absolutely true that, taking the tao or peasant in the Philippine Islands, as a rule if you would pay him 25 cents a day he would work enough days to maintain his living through the week; if you doubled that pay to 50 cents, he would work half the time; if you increased it to a dollar or two dollars, he would cut down the hours of labor exactly in accordance with the amount of pay you give to him, all his ambition being simply to maintain an existence. And why should it not be so? You and I would probably do the same thing under the same circumstances and in the same torrid climate.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I am merely trying to get information; I am not criticising any position you have taken. I understand you to say that away from the seashore the soil was sterile and that civilized people could not subsist there. Well, how do they subsist if the soil is not sufficient to support them by its products?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. By hunting and by wild fruits and by a very crude form of agriculture—very crude, indeed.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Civilized tribes could subsist upon that soil, could they not?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. There is no question but that they could, but they would certainly go to that portion of the islands where subsistence is easiest.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. It is inhabitable, is it not, for civilized people if we could get rid of the savages?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I think it is true to a considerable extent, and I will take up the matter later. When I went across the island of Mindanao I found it practically as it was at Creation's dawn; there is scarcely a particle of that land in cultivation, and I went through it from the seashore on one side to the seashore on the other.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question, just for information?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I heard a very distinguished admiral of our Navy some time since talking about the Philippine Islands and he said that there was a race of savages in the Philippines something like the little brownies that we read about in the books.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Yes; and they are about 70 or 80 miles from Manila; they are the Negritos. They are dwarfs—practically negroes—with kinky hair.

Mr. NORRIS. I call for order; I can not hear.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. There are very few of them, being largely outnumbered by the full-sized Igorrote—a savage.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. What is their proportion of increase?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I think that class of people—the Negritos—and I am speaking from an impression only—are not increasing, but are dying out. I would think that that is also correct with reference to the Igorrotes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Do you know of any effort being made to civilize those people?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I do not think it is possible, any more than it is possible to civilize the Moros.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Do you know of an effort being made to carry some of them to England and undertake to civilize them?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I do not.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. And that on their return to the islands they resumed their savage habits?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I do not think it is possible, from conversations I had with a number of men and women, to civilize the Igorrotes. I do not think it is possible, from all that I have learned in regard to it, to have much success in civilizing the Negritos.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I ask you these questions in view of the statement that you said that after twenty years we would have some 25,000,000 people. If that be so, then we will have more savages.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I was referring to the Filipinos—the various tribes of the Filipino population—when speaking of that.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I want to ask the gentleman if I understood him to say that he did not think it is possible to civilize the Negritos?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I do not believe it, but I do not think my opinion would be very valuable upon that subject. I want now to refer to the principal island and tell you, as far as I understand it, what there is on the seacoast. I mean the island of Luzon. The tobacco which is exported from the archipelago, all of it substantially, comes from the island of Luzon, and it comes almost entirely from this river valley running right down there. I have another map, which I will use later, showing that tobacco district. The export tobacco comes entirely from the Cagayan Valley, the fields extending about a mile on each side of the river from the town of Alcala up to the town of Echague. It is probably a distance of from 50 to 75 miles. On this island rice, cocoanuts, sweet potatoes, and a very little sugar are also grown. The largest area of tillable land is just in this other valley, stretching from Manila to Dagupan. It is a splendid, wide, cultivated valley. I have been through it from the seacoast to the seacoast—right through the whole of it. It is a garden spot, if there is one in the world.

It is largely devoted to the cultivation of rice. I went through there in May, four years ago, and did not see a piece of sugar cane. I do not know whether it was in the right season of the year or not, but I did not see any sugar cane in that entire 120 miles. But in the Pampanga district there is some little production of sugar cane.

Coming south into the provinces of Cavite and Batangas you get principally rice cultivation and very little sugar. Right south of the Laguna de Bay is the largest area of cocoanut plantations that there is in the whole archipelago. Then coming this way into the peninsula of Luzon you get purely a hemp country or almost entirely so. Of course there is some rice and there are some sweet potatoes, but nothing in the way of export food products or in the way of supplying any of the other islands. The whole country in here is practically given up to the cultivation of hemp. Legaspi, which we visited, is one of the largest export points for hemp in the island.

Now, coming on down through the other islands, this was our course——

Mr. BONYNGE. Before leaving that——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Certainly; at any time.

Mr. BONYNGE. What is the area of the island of Luzon?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. The area of the island of Luzon is 40,969 square miles.

Mr. BONYNGE. What proportion of that island is included in the lands that are arable? Can you tell us that?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I can not tell. I will have to refer you to page 181 of volume 4 of the census reports. You will find that table all complete there, and you will find the volume in the Ways and Means Committee room.

We went from Manila southward to Iloilo, in the island of Panay. It is a city of about 20,000 people. It is the main exporting point for sugar from the islands, the reason being that across from Iloilo, on the island of Negros, are the main sugar plantations of this archipelago. I have not gone into the figures carefully, but I understood the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means to say yesterday that from Negros came eight-tenths of the sugar that was raised in the Philippine Islands. Am I correct?

Mr. PAYNE. That was the statement of Mr. Welborn.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Now, I want to say, and especially to our beet-sugar friends, that I do not think they have any conception of the difficulties under which the sugar business is carried on in the Philippine Islands. That sugar comes from the west side of this island. That is Occidental Negros. On this side is Oriental Negros, where very little sugar is raised. There is not a harbor on the island—not one—and when Secretary Taft and his friends wished to go to that island to study the conditions of that industry there, they had to be carried ashore on bamboo rafts. I was engaged in other things that day and did not make that visit, but I have no doubt that some of the gentlemen here who did go there can explain the embarrassments of navigation at the island of Negros. It therefore follows that all the sugar from this island has to be carried across this channel to the port of Iloilo, where ships can go, and from which place the exports are made.

Now, just imagine for a moment an American farmer or a sugar-cane grower in Louisiana being required to put all his sugar in little bags and carry the entire product of his farm, with a boy and a bag of sugar on the back of a carabao, out throught the mud and put it on a little rowboat and carry it out to a larger boat, and then carry it 30 or 40 miles to Iloilo before finding a market. And yet that is the condition under which eight-tenths of all the sugar of the Philippine Islands is produced. And that does not half give you an idea of the methods that obtain on the farms and plantations where the sugar is grown. No western man can comprehend the primitiveness, the simplicity, the crudeness with which all these agricultural operations are carried on in the Philippine Islands until he goes there and sees it for himself. It is impossible to have any comprehension of it otherwise. And I say as a business man to other business men here that there is not a single industry in the Philippine Islands of any kind or character which any industry in the United States has the slightest occasion to fear. The burden upon us is to lift them up, to enable them to do better. It is not for us to stand back and shiver and measure the honor and dignity and greatness of this nation by a pound of beet sugar or a 5-cent cigar as a measuring rule. [Applause.]

Mr. DWIGHT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. DWIGHT. Do they have to depend upon irrigation to raise crops in any of the Philippine Islands?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I will take that up in a moment. There is no irrigation in the Philippine Islands as we understand it. There is no artificial irrigation. Now, that very question settles the whole problem to a large degree, because the industries are localized by that fact. Why does hemp grow in that province? Why does hemp grow in those islands and not in the others? Simply because hemp must have a porous soil and be cultivated where rain comes every month in the year, otherwise it is not a success. Hemp is the natural product of the Philippine Islands. It is not hemp at all; it is abaca, a species of the banana plant. It is a natural product, and is not cultivated as sugar and tobacco are any more than apple trees or peach trees are cultivated.

Now, down here in Negros there are large areas of arable land. Twenty-one per cent of the whole island is arable land, and there the sugar is grown. On Panay a variety of crops are raised, like rice, sweet potatoes, corn, etc.

From Iloilo we came down to the Moro country, and had an exceedingly interesting visit there, but the recital would not bear on this subject or on the subject of this bill particularly, because there are no agricultural operations carried on there. They raise a little rice, perhaps a little sugar, a great deal of cocoanut, and fish for pearls and pearl shells. The strange thing about it is that the entire product of the pearl-shell fisheries is sent to London, and our manufacturers of cutlery go to London and buy that product and bring it back to the United States and sell it to you at an increased cost. Why should we not have it shipped to the United States and have it at first cost?

Now, you can judge of the civilization of this portion of the archipelago and the extent of its agricultural and manufacturing operations when I say to you that a man down here will sell for $40 or $50, while a woman brings from $60 to $100. A good diver who is a success will sell for $100—twice as much as the ordinary laborer will bring. So there is nothing down there which this country should have any reason to fear. The same thing is true in regard to Jolo, where the Sultan of Sulu resides.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. CLAYTON. Did I understand the gentleman from Connecticut to say that traffic in human beings is still going on down there?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I did not see any of it, but I believe it is.

Mr. CLAYTON. Selling human beings?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I think that is true.

Mr. CLAYTON. We have been there how many years?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Five years.

Mr. CLAYTON. And we have not stopped that traffic in human beings yet?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. No.

Mr. CLAYTON. And this benevolent assimilation has been going on all that time?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I think that is true. There is absolute savagery, and I think you will find it anywhere where savagery exists. I am glad that at this late hour the moral tone of the gentleman from Alabama has been raised.

Mr. CLAYTON. And the great Republican party has been in power all this time?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. That is true.

Mr. CLAYTON. And has not been able to put down slavery and traffic in human beings?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I think that is true, and it would be in the United States to-day but for that great Republican party. [Prolonged applause on the Republican side.] Now, I beg the gentleman's pardon. I do not want to get into a discussion, but desire to confine my remarks to this bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. But, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask our school-teacher a few more questions. He still has not answered my question. I would like to know why we have been there five years and the traffic in human beings has not been stopped.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I decline to answer that question at this time. I want to confine my remarks now to this bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. Why, the gentleman is illuminating the whole question of the Philippine Islands—the different people there, the soil and the climate and the business methods, and he pictures in glowing terms the possibilities—a teeming population of 25,000,000 people—and I would like to know when we are going to get rid of this traffic in human beings over there.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, we came up to the south side of the island of Mindanao. It was very greatly desired by the Secretary that the Members of Congress should go through this new, absolutely uncultivated country, and judge of its fertility and the general character of the island. We landed on the south side of Mindanao and made a two days' journey directly through the heart of the Moro country. Of course we were protected by troops. There was a company of cavalry ahead of us and a company of cavalry behind us and four cavalrymen around each wagon as we rode through. We met occasional straggling Moros and passed by Moro villages. I think it is the most fertile soil I have ever seen in any part of the world—that is, on the high table-lands, rising from 2,500 to 2,800 feet above the seacoast. We came up to Lake Lanas, which lies in a pocket about 800 feet deep and, crossing the lake, drove down to Camp Overton, on the other side of the island. We were surprised at the marvelous forests and the perfectly wonderful jungles of the Tropics. But, in my opinion, the island is impossible of cultivation as long as 250,000 savages—Mohammedan Moros—live there, who not only hold the white men as enemies, but above all other things are deadly hostile to the Filipinos—both the Visayans and the Tagalogs.

From there we came up to the island of Cebu. Negros is a sugar island, and right opposite is Cebu, where there is no sugar. Now, why? Simply because of the character of the soil and the location of the island. That is all. Cebu is the most densely populated island in the whole archipelago, and its agricultural products, while, of course, perhaps a little sugar is grown for home consumption, are of such a character as are necessary to the maintenance of the dense population of the island itself, and aside from that, hemp, for the city of Cebu is next to the largest or the largest hemp-shipping port in the archipelago. All of these islands over here are in precisely the same situation in regard to products. Cebu is a hemp island, and if anything in the way of exports comes from either Cebu or Bohol, it is hemp—nothing, practically, in the way of sugar or rice or anything of that kind. Next we went to the city of Tacloban, in the island of Leyte, and a more prosperous looking community it would be difficult to find in any country anywhere—clean and well-made streets, sidewalks, good houses—everything indicating prosperity.

At every place where we went there were hearings concerning the products of the locality, and generally an industrial procession, and oftentimes an industrial exposition, showing the products of the province. In the procession at Tacloban I noticed this banner: "This province has never asked for free rice." Now, what did that mean? It was this: That over in the island of Cebu a million dollars' worth of property was consumed by a severe conflagration last spring, and following that a very severe drought, practically destroying their hemp crop, and we found there or were told there that from four to five thousand persons were daily receiving free rice in order to sustain life throughout the year until another crop could be put in and produced. They were in extremely embarrassed circumstances and unfortunate conditions on the island of Cebu. Tacloban was boasting of its own prosperity. From Tacloban we went to Legaspi, and then to Sorsogon. From there we returned to Manila. Now, as to the localization of their industries. The cocoanut product of the islands is confined to certain localities. The tree must grow near the salt water. It must drink salt water through its roots every day. That, at least, is the proverb.

Copra is the dried meat of the cocoanut. From it oil is extracted and used largely in the manufacture of soap. It is the only article which will make soap which can be used with salt water. It is a seacoast product and is shipped principally to France. Why is not that copra shipped to the United States? It is admitted free of duty just as we admit hemp. Why is it not shipped here instead of being sent to France and then brought back to us to a considerable extent made into fancy soaps for which we pay a very high price? I am in favor of such a policy as will cause the products of these islands to come here and be manufactured here, instead of bringing them to our markets in a manufactured state filtered through European factories and increased in value by European labor. That is the kind of a protectionist I am. I am a protectionist from the crown of my head to the soles of my feet, but I am a protectionist against foreign nations and not against our own people. [Applause.]

Mr. CASSEL. What effect would this bill have upon an article which is now brought into this country free?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I am going to show you by and by; I am glad you asked the question. I will not do it now. Now, take the rice crop. Three million two hundred thousand acres all told in the archipelago are under cultivation. Sixteen hundred thousand acres—one half of them are in rice, and instead of increasing the sugar and tobacco crop they must increase the rice production in order to sustain life. I think there were seven or eight million dollars worth imported from the East Indies last year. Gentlemen, these people must ultimately take all the extra land that they have which is arable and put it in rice, and they would now if they could. Why can not they? Because soil that will raise hemp must be porous, so that the water will run through it; but the soil that raises rice must be heavy and hold water, because they have no artificial system of irrigation. I tried to get a provision in the general bill which was introduced by the gentleman from Wisconsin three or four years ago, providing for irrigation companies in that country, as gentlemen will remember, but there are none there now. They have no capital for artificial irrigation and they do not understand it, but such irrigation as they have is secured by planting in heavy soil that will hold water and letting the rains provide irrigation by natural processes instead of artificially.

Mr. CASSEL. Is not that the way they do in Louisiana?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I will ask the gentleman from Louisiana if it is not all artificial there.

Mr. PUJO. All.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. There is a great difference between the two places, and I believe that if this bill is passed, in five years—yes, in three—we will be sending rice to the Philippine Islands and selling to those people right from the fields of Louisiana and Texas.

Mr. PUJO. At the proper time, if the gentleman will excuse me, I intend to take the position that it will bring about great injury upon the rice industry of this entire country.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Now, gentlemen, I have shown you the system of cultivation of the four principal crops. Of hemp last year they exported $22,000,000 worth. Its cultivation is confined by natural reasons to certain portions of the island. Of sugar they exported four millions. Its cultivation is confined by natural reasons to certain portions of the island. Tobacco is in precisely the same situation. I will go into that more thoroughly by and by. I have spoken of the rice production. Copra or cocoanut is confined to the seacoast, and they exported about $1,999,000 worth in the year past.

Mr. PAYNE. I think it is about 4,000,000 of copra.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. One million nine hundred and ninety-nine thousand dollars worth of copra and about the same of tobacco and about 4,000,000 of sugar.

Mr. PALMER. What is copra?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. That is the dried meat of the cocoanut. Now, gentlemen, after visiting the islands we came back to Manila. I question very much whether it is wise for me at this time to go into any consideration of the hearings which were held in the city of Manila in view of the questions that my genial friend from Alabama asked me a little while ago, because I want to confine my remarks solely to this bill, but I can not refrain from saying this in regard to them. The meetings were held in the city hall, commencing at 9 o'clock each morning and continuing until noon, then lunch, and continuing generally until 4 or 5 o'clock in the afternoon. The governors of all these provinces were present.

Gentlemen interested in the various industries all through the islands were present. Anybody whom they chose to put on the stand was gladly received and welcomed and his statement heard with respect and with attention. That was the procedure during the first week. At the urgent solicitation, however, of some members of the party it was decided when we returned to Manila, after making the trip around through the islands, that the hearings should be thrown open to anybody who chose to speak on any subject whatever, in addition to the questions of hemp, the shipping bill, tobacco, and the agricultural products of the islands. And I must say one thing in connection with that, for it seems to me to redound to the credit of the American nation. When the delegation went away word was left that if there were any criticisms to be made, any charges of malfeasance in office, any charges of improper conduct in office by any American officials in the islands, if they would be submitted in writing they would be carefully considered and investigated by the Members of Congress who were there on their return, and I want to say for the credit of the great American Republic that when we came back and the doors were thrown wide open for discussion and consideration not a single charge of any kind or character was made against any American official. And in response to my question to several of them as to why they had not done as they had intimated the week before that they would do, the reply was that there were no such charges that could be sustained. [Applause.]

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. There were complaints in those hearings about excessive salaries.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. There may have been, but I remember none in the hearings. But there was one case I now recall of criticisms made at the Filipino banquet. I think myself there is some cause for complaint concerning excessive expenditure in the Philippine Islands. I say frankly as a Republican to-day, it is your fault and mine, and not their fault out there. If five years ago the United States Government could have fixed a definite and clear policy as to the course it would take in regard to those islands, in my honest judgment the expense for maintenance of government there could have been very largely reduced. But we were divided as to what course should be pursued. Some of us said, "Oh, by and by, when they are fit for self-government." Others wanted independence right away. Others said: "Never." What was the result? The American officials there would have been derelict in the performance of their duty if they had not gone forward and used every possible effort to build those people up to an understanding not of a government such as they had under Spain, but along the line of self-government. And those things could not be done without an elaborate expenditure of money.

The trouble has been in America, not in the Philippine Islands, with regard to extravagance of expenditure, and difference of opinion among ourselves as to the policy to be pursued there has compelled it. There is not a Member of this House but knows that if a good, strong man could have understood five years ago just exactly what the policy of the United States Government would be in the islands he could have managed the matter with far less expense than has been incurred. Of course he would not have obtained the same results. You can not reduce that expense, gentlemen, until you come to a clear and definite expression of policy, in my judgment. Now, why——

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH]?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to ask if there is not a very considerable disagreement as to the future policy of the United States in the archipelago?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I will answer that in a certain way—perhaps I ought not to, but I will—by saying that a gentleman for whom I have the highest regard, differing with me politically—I will not mention his name and I do not want you to ask me his name—said to me as we were leaving Yokohama to come home, "Mr. HILL, you and I came out here with differing views on this question." He was a great deal further from right than he supposed he was. I have always been a pessimist in regard to this proposition. He said, "You and I came out here with very differing views as to the policy that should be pursued here. I have seen a great many things, and I have made up my mind to this—that it makes no difference, and will make no difference in the future as to whether the Republican party or the Democratic party is in power, the United States will never give up these islands, and the best thing we can do is to take the question out of politics and do the best we can for these poor people." [Applause.] And it was the wisest expression of opinion I have heard for many a day.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. If the gentleman will permit an additional question. I say, understanding that to be the policy of the Government of the United States, to hold on to the archipelago and to give them the best government it may be within our power to give——

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. That is right.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky (continuing). I understand that to be pretty well the established policy now; and while I differ with my friend politically and differ with him widely and radically upon this proposition, yet when a policy is established I think that when we all think we can not abolish that policy we ought to go along and do the best we can for these people. Now, what is to hinder, when this policy has been established, a reduction in the expenses of the Philippine Islands?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I think it is being done now and has been going on for some time. I am very certain that Vice-Governor Ide has been at work for many months making a conscientious effort to bring about a very material reduction in the expenses of the island, and my personal judgment is that it ought to be done.

The gentleman from Kentucky asked a question in regard to the expression of opinion of the Filipinos. Of course I can not go into the details in regard to that. I am simply expressing my judgment. The professional men——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Before you leave that branch of the subject I want to get at what per cent of decrease could be made in the expenses of the island?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I would rather refer you to the hearings which are printed and ready for distribution in the Ways and Means Committee. I think you will find full details there given by Governor Ide.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I did not know but what the gentleman had it in mind.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I have not.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In reply to the question of the gentleman from Maine, I wish to say that a member of the Philippine government told me in Manila this summer that they hoped to make a reduction in the expenditures of a hundred thousand dollars a year.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What percentage would that be of the annual expenditure?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I could not tell you what percentage of the expenditures it would be.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Does the gentleman from Connecticut know?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I do not recollect; I simply say as my individual judgment that a very large reduction of the expenses can be made, except in one direction, and that, gentlemen, is in the line of education. I am going to take that up in a minute or two. I should regret exceedingly to learn that anything less should be done in the direction of giving more and better education to those people.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. One other question, if the gentleman will permit me.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Was it not the general impression of the intelligent people with whom you communicated that it would be unfortunate and a calamity to thrust the English language down the throats of these people in the schools?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I do not think that is true. I think practically the contrary. The independencias—the people who believe in immediate independence—favor the retention of the use of Spanish as the official language of the islands, but I think the people generally desire to have the children taught English. At these hearings Mr. Lukbau, Mr. Illustre, and Mr. Gomez, who claimed to represent the labor unions of the island, and other gentlemen claiming to represent various classes of people, attempted to show to us that there was a general concensus of opinion among those people who dissented from the American administration that they would like to have the immediate independence of the islands, neutrality to be guaranteed by the civilized powers of the world and they to be put in possession, with a protectorate established under the United States and to be maintained by the United States Army and Navy at our expense, while they carried on the government. Now, that was the general consensus of opinion of all those who advocated immediate independence, but, in my judgment, 99 per cent of the business interests of the Philippine Islands, the professional men, the church representatives—I mean all the churches; I do not simply mean the Catholic Church, which is the dominating church in the islands, but all the churches—the lawyers, the doctors, the teachers, all stand for American control and sovereignty.

And there are only a very few men, who are professional agitators, who are making this demand for a protectorate or for an independent government, and they base it on this proposition. Let me put it to a legislative body in a self-governing republic. Their idea was this: "That the Philippine Islands have demonstrated their capacity for self-government, because," as they say, "there is among us a small directing class who know how to govern, and the great mass of the people know how to obey. They have demonstrated that for the last three hundred years. We therefore think we are capable now of conducting this government if you will put it in our hands as the directing class." We asked the gentleman who made this statement to which class he belonged, and he said that modesty would forbid his saying; but the fact that he was there was proof positive that he belonged to the directing class. He thought that we should put the government wholly into the hands of a few who consider themselves the directing class, and that the great mass of the people were a class who knew how to obey. We asked them how long they thought a republic based on the government of the people by themselves would endure, according to their idea. Yet that is precisely what has been going on there substantially for the last three hundred years, and they know nothing else.

Now, in regard to the criticisms which the gentleman spoke about as to American administration, there is no doubt that some criticism has been made. I did not hear it voiced any more thoroughly and completely than I did by a very bright lawyer who spoke, as these gentlemen who were there will remember, at the dinner at the Metropole Hotel—the Philippine dinner. He said—I am giving his statement from memory—"We accept American sovereignty, but it has not been our custom to go as fast as you people are going. We do not criticise the breakwater, the sidewalks, the streets, the sewers, or the railroads in themselves. We do not say you have spent too much money or that we have not got our money's worth. We simply say that in an Asiatic, oriental country we are not in the habit of doing all these things to-day. We think it is better to wait and to leave some of them until to-morrow." In other words, it was the radical difference between oriental sluggishness and the American hustle. That is the occasion for all the criticism there is. These people are just exactly what you would expect after three hundred years of the kind of government which they have had.

There has been no incentive to economy. Why should a man be economical when he knows that a taxgatherer, who is the agent of a Spanish governor-general, if he finds that he has a dollar and a half in his pocket, is going to take away a dollar and a quarter and leave him only a quarter? Why is he going to try to be economical? It has come from custom, from tyranny, from plunder, and from the robberies of three hundred years, to be hereditary in those people, so that there is no such thought as economy or industry or energy or activity in the common masses. How are we going to cure it? We can cure it, but it is a great problem, and in my judgment the only possible thing is to commence at the bottom with the children and give them education, generation after generation, and build them up into a new people. They are quick, they are eager, they are ready and anxious to learn, they are interested in the subject. The last year of Spanish occupation Spain expended $80,000 for educational purposes in those islands. When I was there five years ago we had 120,000 children in school. To-day we have half a million children in school, and last year we spent $2,000,000 for educational purposes, and I wish from the bottom of my heart that it had been $4,000,000. [Applause.]

I would vote for free trade to-day between the Philippine Islands and the United States if it was not for the mere necessity of giving them revenue in some shape or other to increase their educational facilities in the islands. [Applause.] It is right in principle that they should have free trade with this country. No man can stand here and talk about putting a tariff between one American and another. They are our people. They are not ours by their choice, but by the act of God or the conquest of the American nation. They are helpless in your hands. What are you going to do? Are you going to treat them worse than Spain treated them? God forbid. [Applause.] Now, what have we done?

Mr. BONYNGE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. BONYNGE. You say you would give them the same tariff laws that we have and that it is right they should have the same tariff laws?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I say frankly that if I had my way I would treat them exactly as we are treating Porto Rico; I would put the American Dingley tariff right around the islands and have absolute free trade between the islands and the United States, if it could be done; but you can not do it to-day.

Mr. BONYNGE. In the last session of Congress I suppose you voted for the Philippine tariff bill, did you not?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I did; I did.

Mr. BONYNGE. I will ask the gentleman if we are treating the Philippine Islands, even upon the tariff question, as we are treating the rest of our possessions?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. We are not, but I want to see the day when we will.

Mr. BONYNGE. Importations from other countries into the Philippine Islands are governed by different laws than importations into the United States from other countries. Is not that true?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I will say to the gentleman that I have seen Members of Congress who were compelled by the exigencies of the case and the peculiar conditions that in years gone by have surrounded them who have been obliged to vote contrary to their convictions. It is just as true of governments. They must do the best they can under the circumstances as they find them, but there is no reason on earth why a great nation like ours, full of Christian people, should not bring their moral ideas up to the treatment of these poor people and enable them to help themselves.

Mr. BONYNGE. I want to arrive at the gentleman's idea.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. You can not arrive at it; it is utterly impossible. [Laughter.]

Mr. BONYNGE. The gentleman says I can not arrive at his idea?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I do not think you can. I have been trying myself to formulate it on this question for five years. [Laughter.]

Mr. BONYNGE. If the gentleman has no idea formulated, I will not press the question further.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. It will not interrupt me at all; it is only a question at a time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I wish the gentleman would explain to the House in this connection what is the reason we can not have that free trade now with the Philippine Islands?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Because the revenue is absolutely necessary to enable these people over there to carry on their government, give education to the people, give them more schoolhouses and more teachers, and go on with the public works which have been begun. If the American people will stand up and say we will pay these bills out of our Treasury instead of the Philippines getting the money in the ordinary way, by internal revenue and customs duties, I am for free trade now.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There is one other element which enters into it which I wish the gentleman would speak of, and that is the Spanish treaty.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I do not fear that at all. I will say to the gentleman that I do not believe it is possible in the next three years for the Spanish Government to adjust itself so as to get any marked advantage out of any free trade it might have with the Philippine Islands. I do not fear it if it did come, and under the provisions of this bill, whereby Spain would be obliged to give the Philippine Islands the same concession which we give, she would lose enormously more than she would gain, because she has a monopoly of tobacco, and if she threw her ports open to shipment to the Philippine Islands she would lose, because practically all of the tobacco from the Philippine Islands is shipped to Spain.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There is one thing which bothers me, and has a great many other gentlemen, and that is, What is the reason they can not run the Philippine government there from the internal revenue?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Because they never have had in the Philippine Islands a system of internal revenue until it was put into operation a year ago the 30th of last July. They are not used to it, and, furthermore, it is working with considerable friction now. In my judgment, in the end it will work out in such a way as to give a sufficient revenue, so that we can have free trade with them, and they can dispense with the duties. But I do not think this can be done in less than two or three years. When I make my remarks on tobacco I will refer to their experience with the internal-revenue tax.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has spoken about a subject that I have most at heart, and that is the maintenance of the revenue in the islands, so that you will not have to have a land tax on the islands and turn the people out of the possession of their lands by taxation. Is it safe to leave that clause in the bill which says we are going to have absolute free trade?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Why, certainly not. I assert over and over again that if conditions were such that we could do it,

I would be glad to dispense with this whole restriction on trade between one part of our own people and another part, but we can not do it. The gentleman himself has called attention to the land tax.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman from Connecticut understands the question.

Mr. PARKER. I ask if it is safe to maintain that clause of this bill which says that we will abolish all duties in 1909. Is it not safer to wait until then and find out whether they can get along without the revenue?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I do not think so. I do not think there is any question about the ability of the Philippine government with a fair degree of prosperity to get internal taxation sufficient to take care of themselves three years from now.

Mr. PARKER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask whether it is safe to put internal taxation upon as poor a people as they, who know so little how to manage and keep their land, whether the example of Porto Rico and the difficulties of the population there, with the small trades being destroyed by the competition of the American shopmade goods, ought not to make us careful in taking away from them at any time or saying that we are going to take away the right to make their revenue out of tariff duties?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I do not think there is any question in regard to the ability of the Philippine Islands after an experience with a well-organized internal-revenue system to raise funds to carry on the government economically administered.

Mr. NORRIS. I would suggest to the gentleman from Connecticut that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], the chairman of the committee, in answer to a question the other day, said he had a doubt about the benefit that would accrue to the Philippine people, as a matter of fact, from the reduction of this tariff on sugar and tobacco.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to get the gentleman's idea on that subject.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. The gentleman will get it precisely and specifically and definitely—one, two, three—when I get to the tobacco part of this question.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has been speaking of internal-revenue receipts. Do they receive anything from the customs there now?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Yes; and I am glad the gentleman spoke of that, for it illustrates another feature of our legislation. The gentleman asks me if they receive anything from the customs duties collected here. They do. We turn them all over to them. It goes into their treasury instead of into the United States Treasury. When we had a 15 per cent duty on goods coming from Porto Rico, we turned that duty all back to them. Porto Rico to-day has her internal-revenue receipts and customs receipts. They all go into the Porto Rican treasury. And further than that, we are trying to get the Philippines to the same point and the same treatment afforded to Porto Rico.

Now, the customs duties on goods coming from the Philippine Islands, on the tobacco and sugar that will come here under this bill, if it does come, will be paid back to the Philippine Islands. More than that, the tonnage dues on ships sailing from the Philippine Islands to our ports—foreign ships—all go back to the Philippine Islands. I will tell you what kind of a bargain we made in that matter. A law was enacted three years ago that the duties which were received on Philippine products should be paid back into the Philippine treasury. There was a concurrent provision made that export duties from the Philippine Islands should be abated on goods coming to the United States, and where they get $7.50 a ton on hemp exported from the Philippine Islands to all parts of the world, when it comes to the United States they do not get anything, so that taking the rebate on the export of the hemp coming to the United States to our factories, and figuring it up from the passage of the bill down to 1905, we have had the benefit of $1,547,002.18, and we have paid back to them customs duties amounting to $1,256,250.01, and we are about a quarter of a million dollars better off for the three years than they are, and their treasury has been deprived of so much money, every dollar of which could have been used to advantage in the education of their people.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Does the gentleman mean that that sum of a million and a half has gone into the Treasury of the United States or the importers have received that?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I mean it has practically gone to our people who imported the hemp and used it—to the farmers in the West for cheaper binding twine, for instance.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It did get into the Treasury?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. The duties collected here went into our Treasury, but they went out again and were paid over to the Philippine treasury.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I wanted to get at that distinction, and I want to make another inquiry, if I may be permitted——

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. And I ask the gentleman if he thinks that is fair treatment of those people who can not help themselves?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do not stand for this proposition at all. I do not believe in exploiting that for a minute in this country, and never have. Now, I want to ask the gentleman this question: In relation to this clause providing for the repeal of the duties at the end of something like three years, I understood the gentleman to say, if they had a condition of business and industrial prosperity in the Philippines, that that internal-revenue tax would provide funds enough to carry on the government——

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I did say so.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Did the gentleman find a condition of industrial and agricultural prosperity in the Philippines when he was there that would produce this result of which he speaks?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. So far as the copra and the hemp industry is concerned, yes. So far as the sugar and tobacco industry is concerned they are in a very deplorable condition, as I will show when I take up the question of tobacco.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And unless something is done to rehabilitate those industries, would it be prudent for us to pass legislation repealing that tariff at the end of three years?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. In regard to that I will try to demonstrate it at the tobacco end of the question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman state the revenue the Philippine government will get if this bill is enacted—the estimated revenue?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. It is entirely problematical, I will say to the gentleman. I think I can give a better answer to that in arguing as to the effect of this change in policy with reference to the tobacco industry. It is entirely problematical.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman has stated how much has been paid by the Philippine government during the past fiscal year in the way of customs duties. Now, there will be all except 25 per cent.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I could not tell; I do not know.

Mr. PRINCE. Will the gentleman yield for a further question on the same line?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. PRINCE. What I would like to know is, do the government officials there acting for us and for the Filipinos receive any customs duties there? If so, how much and where does it go?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. A very large amount. I think the Philippine Islands got from customs duties last year somewhere in the neighborhood of $7,000,000, and I think that about $1,200,000 of it was from goods going from the United States to the Philippine Islands. Now, I may be all wrong. That is simply a mere guess.

Mr. PRINCE. In which treasury does it go?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Into the Philippine treasury.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why did the committee fix 25 per cent instead of some other percentage if it had no idea of how much revenue is going to be derived?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I can not answer that question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, can any member of the gentleman's committee?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I can not answer for the other members of the committee. I think very likely it will be answered before the debate is finished, but it did not seem to come into my part of the discussion. Gentlemen, I want you to understand distinctly the condition of the people of the Philippine Islands. It is precisely what you would expect in view of the experiences that they have gone through. I need not enlarge upon the system of despotism which has characterized the government there under Spanish domination, but just stop and think a minute of other things. Since I was there four years ago in a single year the rinderpest caused the death of 75 per cent and possibly more of the draft animals in the islands. Now, imagine the condition that would obtain in the State of Pennsylvania to-day if 75 per cent of the cattle, the horses, and the mules in the State were absolutely exterminated in one year, and yet that would not give you a fair idea of the situation. You must take a purely agricultural State like Iowa, Nebraska, or Kansas, and imagine what the condition would be there if 75 per cent of the draft animals were swept out of existence in a single year.

Mr. CASSEL. Would the Government help us to pay for those animals?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. The Government has not helped them to pay for those animals. They have brought animals there and sold them and tried to help them in any way they could, but they have not given them animals.

In addition to that, they had in 1902 an epidemic of cholera by which 120,000 lives were lost in a single year. They have had insurrection, bubonic plague, cholera, smallpox, and typhoons, and it seems as though the whole country had been swept by the besom of destruction.

Now, that is their condition. What are we doing? In the first place, we are taking the children and trying to educate them, and we are trying to make highways through that country. We have covered this whole archipelago with telegraph lines, giving prompt and ready communication all through these islands, one with another. We have taken Manila—and so far as Manila is concerned it is as much the Philippine Islands as Paris is France, there being the same relation between them—and we have made it, first, a clean city, throttling the cholera and driving it out of the islands, and making the bubonic plague unknown.

That is the first thing—making it so that white people could live there. Then, what else have we done? Why, in place of a little, miserable mule system of transportation five years ago, simply "two streaks of rust and a right of way" through the streets of Manila—nothing more—they have now 33 miles of as fine a trolley system as you will find in any city in the world. We have widened the streets, moved back houses, have turned narrow lanes into public highways, have made artificial stone sidewalks, and put down curbs and gutters. We have enforced sanitary regulations there, and have made a harbor at Manila.

Mr. SULZER. I would like to know the name of the promoter of the trolley in Manila.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I do not know and I do not care. It is a good trolley system, and it is serving the city in first-class style.

Mr. SULZER. I thought probably the city of Manila owned it.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. The franchise, as I understand it, was sold at auction and a good price paid for it, and so far as I could judge it is all right. At any rate it serves the people and is doing a first-class business, and paid 15 per cent last year.

Mr. SULZER. Then it does not belong to the city.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I do not know. I hope not.

Now, gentlemen, four years ago, when I went there, the ship anchored 3 miles out from shore in the bay, and subject to every wind that blew, as dangerous an anchorage as I have ever seen. This time we passed right in behind a $4,000,000 breakwater into a magnificent harbor, absolutely safe. On the Sunday night before we came away a typhoon came up, and with the wind blowing 70 miles an hour not a ship or boat was damaged. They laid there in perfect safety. And, in addition to that, in making that breakwater and dredging that harbor they have made from the waste material 196 acres of new ground on the shore front—ground that would sell at enough to pay for the entire cost of the breakwater. Are they going to sell it? I asked that question. "No." What are they going to do? They intend to run streets through that land and build bonded and free warehouses and piers, and when they have finished them Manila will be the only city in the Orient from Vladivostok to Singapore where a 30-foot draft vessel can go to a wharf and discharge at a warehouse.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman has said that we have built the harbor.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. They have done it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The impression might get out that we paid for it out of the Treasury. They paid for every dollar of it out of their own treasury.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. They have done it out of their revenues. They have made these improvements all the way through. It has not been done at our expense; it has been done at their own. Not only that, but a number of buildings have been erected in Manila. They have a government printing office, an internal-revenue building, and a refrigerating plant which cost a million dollars and is paying 20 or 30 or 40 per cent on the entire cost; and the thing is going along in good shape out there, gentlemen.

Now, then, I say, I have been a pessimist. Four years ago when I left there—and I had been there with my eyes open—I was utterly discouraged at the vastness of the problem which the United States had taken upon its hands. This time, gentlemen, I felt a little better; but I tell you I begin to realize the immensity of the problem. It is a burden upon this nation, but we are too big and too rich and too strong and too courageous to lay that burden down, in my judgment. [Applause.]

It is in the interest of civilization that we should carry it, and we ought not to consider simply our own poor selves. I do not know whether God Almighty put us there or not. I do not want to discuss that question. I simply know that we are there, and as a great, strong, rich nation we have no right to shut ourselves between two oceans here and say we will be indifferent to the progress of the rest of mankind. We contribute our money annually to the missionary work of the respective churches to which we belong. There is a practical missionary question for you, gentlemen, and one glimmering gleam of good sense has come to the missionary institutions of the United States in the work in that field. When they went there, instead of getting into competition, they have distributed the territory, with Manila as common ground. I come to you advocating no fixed course that the United States should pursue, but I came away with an object lesson that has very nearly converted me to the idea that after all this experiment may ultimately be profitable to the United States, and I will tell you what it is. We sailed from Manila right over to Hongkong, 600 miles away. I had never been at Hongkong before, and I did not know what I was going to find. Sixty years ago it was a barren rock 12 miles long and 6 or 8 miles wide.

The city of Kowloon is the nearest Chinese city, right at the mouth of the Pearl River, and on the other side is the city of Victoria. China ceded to Great Britain this barren mountain that rises 2,500 feet so steeply a man could not go up it straight. There it stood with nothing on it, and China ceded it to Great Britain sixty years ago. There never was a year for the first twenty years that England held that island of Hongkong that some man did not rise in the English Parliament and move a retrocession back to China—not a year. And what is it to-day? One of the most magnificent cities in the world, with a population of 220,000.

In Manila we start with a population of 240,000 or 250,000. Hongkong has a population now of 220,000. The Englishmen scraped down the loose earth and piled it up behind a sea wall, and now they have three rows of streets, splendid streets, between that and the mountain; and then they went to work and built rock terraces and fine macadam zigzag walks and roads up the mountain side and now it is covered with magnificent residences, making one of the most beautiful sights I have ever seen when lighted at night. It is a splendid city, the sixth largest shipping port in the world, and Great Britain is to-day as likely to part with Liverpool as with Hongkong. Yet, as I say, for the first twenty years there never was a year that some one did not try to get a retrocession back to China on account of the great burden it was to be to England.

Gentlemen, do not let us get discouraged in this great work, but let us take up our burden like Americans and ask God to bless us and give us prosperity and help us to go on to final success. [Loud applause.]

I am going to give you now a plain, straight, practical, business talk on tobacco, and you will pardon me if I do not try to reach the outer limits of this Hall with my voice. Its acoustic properties are not too good, anyway.

In entering upon the consideration of the tobacco question I desire to ask the especial attention of those Members whose constituents are at all interested in the growing of leaf tobacco or its manufacture in any form. The proposition in the bill is that the tariff on tobacco coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands shall be 25 per cent of the present Dingley rates in lieu of 75 per cent, as now. This will make on unmanufactured leaf tobacco, commonly known as "filler tobacco," 8¾ cents a pound duty, and on wrapper tobacco 46¼ cents a pound duty. It will make the duty on cigars $1.12½ a pound, plus 6¼ per cent ad valorem, and in addition to this the regular internal-revenue tax paid on domestic cigars of $3 a thousand. This to continue for three years, and then, under the terms of the bill, reciprocal free trade to be established between the Philippine Islands and the United States.

The growing of tobacco was introduced into the Philippine Islands in the sixteenth century by the Spaniards. Its cultivation and sale was held as an absolute monopoly by the Spanish Government for one hundred years.

With reference to the success of the industry and the quality of the product I shall not express my individual opinion, but shall quote from well-recognized authorities on the subject.

First, from the commissioner of internal revenue of the islands, from the advance sheets of his report for the fiscal year of 1905, not yet printed, and to which I have fortunately had access within the last few days. He says:

In the provinces of Cagayan and Isabela is produced the only tobacco fit for use in the manufacture of the better quality of cigars and cigarettes. Except for limited local consumption by the persons raising it or for purposes of blending it with the better leaf, there is no demand for the tobacco raised outside of the provinces of Cagayan and Isabela. The Spanish Government had a monopoly which lasted one hundred years in the manufacture of all leaf tobacco produced in these islands. The Government supervision over the planting, curing, and sorting of the leaf was absolute, and the quality of the tobacco was improved and the quantity increased by such supervision. In 1882 the Government monopoly was abolished and the planting and manufacture of tobacco became free for all. Since then the quality of the leaf produced in Cagayan and Isabela has constantly deteriorated from season to season. No sufficient preparation of the soil, no care in the selection of the seed, of the method of planting, or of the growing of the leaf, crude methods in curing the leaf, and dishonest practices of middlemen in sorting it for sale have all contributed to discredit the former fair fame of Philippine tobacco both abroad and at home. A constantly increasing number of smokers in these islands are discarding the domestic cigar and cigarette and are smoking cigars imported from Sumatra and elsewhere, imported Chinese smoking tobacco, and even cigarette and pipe tobacco from the United States. On May 18, 1905, some of the leading cigar and cigarette manufacturers of Manila entered into an agreement having for its object an increase in the production and improvement in the quality of the tobacco leaf in Cagayan and Isabela, as well as to secure, if possible, more uniformity in the sorting of the leaf by middlemen. Little effective work, however, has as yet been done along these lines. Meanwhile the quality of the leaf continues to deteriorate, and the local manufacturers find it an increasingly difficult task to supply demands for domestic consumption.

Further on he states:

The tobacco now cultivated in the Cagayan Valley may be said to be without doubt almost a wild plant.

From the best information which I can obtain I judge that the cultivation of tobacco is substantially a garden-patch business, except in the case of three or four manufacturers of Manila, notably among them the Tobacoleria Company.

Speaking of the efforts of these few companies to improve the conditions in the industry, I quote again from the report of the Commissioner:

These plantations, which were to be in a measure agricultural schools, are in the same regrettable state of backwardness as that of a poor laborer who learned nothing more than the path shown him by his grandfather. No machinery is to be found there. On the other hand, the ever-present carabao and the antiquated plow are there furrowing these extensive tobacco fields and not penetrating into the soil more than 12 to 14 centimeters. There is not to be found a single rail or tram way, nor any portable road whatever to gather and carry the product of the fields to the warehouses or shipping places. No fertilizer is used, nor any irrigation other than the fertilizing slime or mud annually left there by the great floods of the river and the rains sent down by Providence.

If such is the case in the large plantations, what must be the conditions among the small, poor planters who have no instruction, no capital, no animals, nor any kind of indispensable appliances to cultivate the land?

I quote further as to the curing of the product on these farms:

Tobacco is at present allowed to dry in the sun. If it rains they cover it, but not always, with a few banana leaves, which cover it so deficiently that in most instances it becomes completely soaked. At night it is left out exposed to the weather and receives all the dew sent down by God. With that method of drying it is entirely impossible to obtain good tobacco, for the leaves, with excess of humidity, attain a variegated color, with black and greenish stains. They lose combustibility and aroma, and acquire a bad odor produced by mold.

Let me quote from the Commissioner's report again as to the methods which were applied by the Spanish Government to the growth of the product. On page 174 the following is found:

Under the tobacco monopoly each family in the tobacco district of Luzon was compelled to grow 4,000 pounds and deliver the entire crop to the agents of the government, and a fine was imposed when the crop was short. Early in the nineteenth century many riots and disturbances arose out of the difficulties in meeting the harsh provisions of the law.

Again I quote, from page 195:

Up to 1882—

The year in which the monopoly terminated—

the Filipino planters of Cagayan and Isabela grew tobacco at the muzzle of a gun. Every family was under the orders and supervision of a government employee, and the worker who disregarded the rules laid down for operation in the fields generally had administered to him a few smarting cuts with a bejuco. This slave driving resulted in first-class tobacco.

It is beyond dispute that the abolition of this government supervision and the leaving of the natives to their own devices and methods and crude cultivation has been exceedingly disastrous to the quantity and quality of the tobacco product of the archipelago. So that the general conclusion, quoted by Internal-Revenue Agent Brown on page 191 of the report referred to, may be accepted as accurate at the present time. He says:

Manufacturers of cigars in these islands, dealers in native leaf tobacco, consumers in the islands of Manila cigars, manufacturers and merchants abroad who have handled in past years Philippine tobacco, consumers abroad of Manila cigars, and the Filipino, whether grower or tobacco merchant, are all of one mind on the tobacco question. Philippine tobacco has gradually sunk to a deplorable level.

There is another fact which tends in this same direction, due, undoubtedly, to lack of care and attention to the growing plant by the native farmer. I quote again from the same report, referring to the manufactured product:

The comparatively small stock kept on hand by most of the small manufacturers is due to the worm which attacks the cigar after its manufacture. In some cases the cigar is attacked by this worm within three months after its manufacture, and in other cases seems to escape until nine months, but seldom escapes beyond that period.

Now, it is not a pleasant task to cite these statements, and in so doing to even have the appearance of depreciating this product of the Philippine Islands. Let it be distinctly understood that I am not in any sense whatever expressing my own opinion, but am quoting from official records in every case.

What have been the causes of this decay of the tobacco industry in the islands? Beyond any question, first, the indifference and carelessness of the natives since the abolition of the Spanish monopoly in the growing of the product, and, second, the methods of its preparation and the manner in which it has been gathered and brought to market. I need not go over again the native method of cultivation. Let me briefly call your attention to what the commissioner says with reference to the marketing of the product. Referring to the fact that the great bulk of the tobacco is now bought from the farmers by the itinerant Chinese merchant, he says:

The Chinaman commenced his gathering of leaf tobacco in the Cagayan Valley on a small scale at first, in the same way as white ants make their first appearance in a sumptuous building, until they finally get hold of it and demolish it. Cagayan and Isabela produce an average yearly crop of 250,000 quintals, the value of which is between one and one-quarter and one and one-half million dollars. It would seem at first sight that with such a handsome capital received by the inhabitants, who do not number 300,000, they ought to enjoy prosperity. Nothing of the kind; said provinces are at present utterly poor. The aforementioned unscrupulous trader, called the "Chinaman," has secured all the trade the native needs to avail himself of, and furnishes it to him at fabulous prices. Should another merchant, coming from a different quarter, engage in the same business it does not take them long to overthrow him, and in this way complete monopoly is exercised. They are the sole money lenders, whose usual interest is peso for peso, and considering they grant loans for six months at the most they earn an annual profit of 200 per cent. This is even more when the loan is made in goods. They are in the habit of increasing the values to 25 per cent higher than the selling price, making barter compulsory, or to deliver tobacco for the total value of goods received, such delivery to be made on the 30th day of June at the latest.

Much more could be quoted along this same line, but sufficient has been given to show the manner in which the crop is raised and gathered from the farmers.

Let me show now the way in which it is packed and put upon the Manila market by these same itinerant merchants. I quote again from the Commissioner: is really scandalous, or to say it more properly, an iniquitous robbery is being committed. As previously stated, the 4ª superior, which is a leaf of good quality, although broken, is mixed with the superior classes, above all with class 1ª, which is of the same size. The first-class tobacco is formed of whole leaves, clean and of a uniform color. The bunch, or bale, as it is called here, weighs from 2½ to 3 quintals. The average quintal consists of approximately eighty hands of 100 leaves each, and, taking as a base the bunch of 2½ quintals, we obtain a total of 200 hands, which multiplied by 100, which each hand contains, would give us 20,000 leaves. As the leaves consist of two halves, divided by the stem, it is evident that each half gives us at least one wrapper, in which case each package should afford as a minimum 40,000 wrappers. However, you may well be frightened, but there is no exaggeration in what I am about to tell you. Any factory turning out at present from forty to fifty thousand cigars of special brands needs to open at least twenty packages of No. 1ª, which, if properly classified, should afford 800,000 wrappers. It may be seen, therefore, that the tobacco industry can not stand this a long time. We are on a slippery road which leads us to a precipice.

The classification offered in this city—

In other words, the sorting and packing of the tobacco is so conducted by these Chinese middlemen, led on by greed for gain, or because of the necessities of the case and the absence of wrappers in the Philippine product, that only 5 per cent of class 1A nets a good cigar wrapper, where it is supposed to have been packed so that the entire bale should be of that quality.

The Chinese merchant handles tobacco simply as an article of commerce. It is true that they know good tobacco, but their one object is money. If 5 pesos profit can not be made by them on a bale then 5 cents will suffice. In buying, the Chino visits the ranches and offers money and merchandise for any class of tobacco, and if not ripe he will buy the leaf as it stands in the fields. Every year these Chinese get more of the growers into their clutches, and that this is a real danger to the reputation of Cagayan and Isabela tobacco all agree. Amongst all the white buyers in the field representing the Manila houses, harmony and competition can hardly be said to exist. All have one object in view—to buy for their superiors in Manila good tobacco, paying therefor a good price. By all of these Europeans bad tobacco is rejected, but this plan is not adopted by the Chino; all is grist that comes to his mill—tobacco, good or bad, to him means money. His methods are in a business sense legitimate, but in another broader sense his operations are not fair. He himself produces no tobacco and is hurting greatly those who do produce.

If it were necessary in any way to corroborate these statements of the officials of the islands, let me call the attention of the House to a memorial addressed to the Secretary of War and the Congressmen visiting the islands during the past summer. This memorial came from the province of Cagayan, and was prepared by the delegates of twenty municipalities, who made the long journey to Manila to welcome the visiting party and outline the situation of that province. They asked for the provisional suspension of the land tax and the removal of the Dingley tariff, for a reduction of the internal-revenue taxes on tobacco, to be effective during three years, with a subsequent gradual increase of said taxes until existing rates have again been reached, for legislation restricting the commerce of the Chinese by confining it to the seaports, and various other remedial measures.

They say that—

The consequences of this state of affairs has been an economic crisis and a general paralyzation which frightens the bravest to such an extent that many of the tobacco growers have resolved not to plant tobacco next season, but use their land for other crops.

And close with this plea:

During the Spanish rule in these islands Spain, in order to protect the tobacco produced by its former colonies, the Philippine Islands, Cuba, and Porto Rico, prohibited the growing of tobacco in its domains, and the Government itself bought up a great portion of the tobacco produced by the aforesaid colonies in order to protect its cultivation and aid the planters. Even after the removal of the government monopoly of the tobacco the Spanish Government continued to protect this product, a goodly portion of which was consumed by the national factories. It also used all means within its powers to induce the other nations to buy this article. The protection afforded to the Philippine tobacco by the Spanish Government ceased with the Spanish sovereignty. Its exportation has considerably diminished, and the fact that Spain still prohibits the cultivation of tobacco within its territory and consumes some of ours is due to the existence of a contract between the Spanish Government and the Spanish company, to which the tobacco has been farmed out, by which it binds itself not to permit the free cultivation of tobacco in Spain and to consume quantities of Philippine tobacco. These benefits will cease upon the expiration of that contract, and the Philippines will then lose the only market left to them in Europe. For these reasons the Government of the United States ought not to delay, but ought to protect this branch of our agriculture in a decided manner before its complete annihilation, which would bring with it the ruin of thousands of persons engaged in the growing of tobacco, and in order to avoid this we ask for the removal of the Dingley tariff at the next session of Congress.

Your visit to these islands will leave an imperishable recollection in the heart of every honorable Filipino, as there is not one who is not confident that we shall soon feel the effects of it and that our economic crisis will be replaced by an abundance of work and of means for gathering the necessities of life, and thus our beloved country will be placed on the same level with the most of the prosperous nations. We beseech you, in the name of the province of Cagayan, to inform the Chief Magistrate of your great country, the United States of America, upon your return there, of our gratitude and of our hopes awakened by your visit, of the affection of these people toward him, and of our confidence that he will lead us to our moral and material advancement.

Signed by the delegates of the Province of Cagayan.

Supplementary to this, and in line with it, let me quote again from the internal-revenue commissioner's report the following:

At the expiration of the Spanish treaty, when Spanish goods cease to be favored by the treaty, it is almost certain that the Spanish monthly mail steamers will also cease to ply, and then it is very probable that the doors of Spain will be closed to Philippine tobacco.

So much for the growth and culture and marketing of the leaf tobacco of the Philippine Islands.

Let me now take up the manufacturing industry. According to the census of 1902, Table 4, entitled "Philippine manufactures, by industry groups," page 482, volume 4, it appears that there are 113 manufacturing establishments, with an aggregate capital of $2,250,201, with a total of 10,150 employees, 5,233 of whom are male and 4,927 female, and with an aggregate value of products of $4,370,258. This includes all forms of manufacture of tobacco—except snuff, which is not made in the islands—cigars, cigarettes, smoking and chewing tobacco. Compared with the enormous product of the United States it is trivial; indeed, one gentleman, Mr. Walter A. Shiffer, of the United Cigar Manufacturing Company, of New York City, stated that the capital of that one company was from seven to eight million dollars, that they had more than 10,000 employees, and produced about 400,000,000 cigars per annum. According to Mr. Shiffer's testimony, one concern in the United States is using, in the manufacture of cigars alone, more than three times the capital invested in the whole industry in the Philippine Islands, employing substantially the same number of persons and producing five times as many cigars as the whole Philippine Islands produced for export last year.

In order that there may be no misunderstanding as to the insignificance of the industry in the Philippine Islands compared with the greatness of the product here, let me give the figures taken from the Internal Revenue Commissioner's report for the year beginning the 1st day of August, 1904, and ending the 30th day of July, 1905—the first full year for which we have any accurate data in the history of the islands—as it consists of records of the industry made for purposes of taxation, and in giving these statistics I shall change kilograms into pounds and pesos into dollars:

Of manufactured tobacco, smoking and chewing, there was a total output consumed in the Philippine Islands of	pounds	425,678
Exported to Spain	do	17,488
Exported to Straits Settlements	do	6,191
Exported to England	do	5,104
Exported to China	do	4,307
Exported to Japan	do	7
Making a total of		458,775

Eighty-four per cent of the tax on this tobacco is paid in Manila and 16 per cent in the provinces. Chewing tobacco is used by the lower class of natives, and they chew it mixed with the betel nut.

With reference to the cigar industry, I find that 90.5 per cent of taxes on cigars was paid in Manila and only 9.5 per cent in the provinces. The total production for home consumption was 69,652,820 cigars of all grades and kinds. There were also manufactured and exported as follows:

Straits Settlements	7,857,821
Australia	6,059,808
India	1,779,614
Japan	584,727
Indo China	502,910
Java	476,167
South Africa	455,391
New Zealand	131,716
Korea	16,296
Persia	5,000
Consumed on the high seas	862,782
Total for the Orient and countries tributary thereto		68,467,892
England	5,258,583
Spain	3,230,170
France	1,875,000
Germany	747,007
Italy	273,570
Switzerland	82,175
Holland	55,000
Egypt	43,050
Belgium	25,500
Scotland	19,700
Total Europe and Egypt		11,609,755
South America		752,137
Canada		116,153
Hawaiian Islands		144,500
United States		167,693
Total cigars exported		81,258,130

Of which it appears that more than 68,000,000 were sold in the Orient and only 167,693 sold in the United States, and as a matter of fact the bulk of these were sold from the Philippine concession at the St. Louis Exposition during the past year and largely as a matter of trial and experiment by our people.

Concerning this export product, the Commissioner says:

China is the best customer, taking about 60 per cent of all the cigars exported from these islands; but much the larger portion of the cigars exported to China are of very inferior grades; they are really large cigarettes wrapped, paper and all, in a strip of leaf tobacco, and are classed as cigars through courtesy and for the lack of a better name.

Let me add to that my own observation, after a thorough and protracted visit to four of the largest cigar factories in Manila. When I say this I mean practically the examination of the industry in the islands, for my conclusion was that outside of eight or ten such factories, all of which are located in Manila, the industry is trivial in its character and amount. I am satisfied, both from the tax records and personal observation, that 90 per cent of the cigars made in the islands for home consumption are extremely low grade, consisting simply of a bunch of tobacco with a piece of leaf wrapped around it and pasted the whole length of the cigar, and, like the cigars shipped to China, designated by that name, as the Commissioner says, "through courtesy and for lack of a better name." Under all the circumstances, I am compelled to agree with the Commissioner in his conclusion that—

The bulk of the cigars produced in the islands could not be sold in the American market at any price, and even if the Philippine cigar was admitted customs duty free into the United States it would not for a long time to come equal 1 per cent of our domestic trade.

And my own judgment is that it would not equal 1 per cent of the average annual increase in the consumption of cigars in the United States. The average annual increase for the past ten years in the production and consumption of cigars in the United States has been 327,753,188, or more than four times the entire export product of the Philippine Islands to all parts of the world last year and 1,955 times as much as the entire importation into the United States from the Philippine Islands last year. The United States produced last year 7,589,337,206 cigars, as against a Philippine export product to all parts of the world, as before stated, of 81,258,130. If it were possible to change the course of their trade from the direction in which it has run since before our nation existed and turn their entire export product into our market, it would be like pouring a bucket of water into the sea—absolutely without effect. As a matter of fact, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue here informs me that there were imported into the United States last year an estimated amount of 63,596,500 cigars from all nations, of which this insignificant amount which I have mentioned came from the Philippines; and this, bear in mind, with a preferential tariff rate of 25 per cent over all other countries. Is it not perfectly manifest that all fear of competition with this great and growing industry in our country, by making the tariff changes proposed in this bill, borders on the absurd and ridiculous?

The product of the Philippine Islands in cigarettes last year was 2,979,351,855, of which all but 14,910,265 were consumed at home, and practically all of the small amount exported was taken by the oriental trade. The record shows none shipped to the United States, but, on the contrary, our record shows small shipments from the United States to the Philippine Islands. The probabilities are that the internal-revenue tax on cigarettes last year did not represent one-half or one-third of the consumption of the islands, as very large quantities of cigarettes were removed from the factories prior to August 1, 1904, to escape the tax which accrued on that date, and as a result the product for the year following was comparatively limited; indeed, it is claimed in Manila that the consumption of cigarettes in the islands will aggregate nine billions annually, and if this is true it will have a very serious effect in diminishing the export product of tobacco, with the rapid growth of population which is sure to occur in years to come with a stable government and the islands blessed with peace and a hoped-for prosperity.

I will insert at this point, for the use of the Members of the House, tables furnished me by the Insular Bureau of the War Department, showing the entire tobacco traffic between the Philippine Islands and all nations.

Table No. 1 shows the exports of tobacco and its products from the Philippine Islands to all countries since American occupation, including the years 1899 to 1905.

Table No. 2 shows the imports of leaf tobacco and its products into the Philippine Islands for the same period.

[b] Imports of cigars during 1899 and 1900 are included under cigarettes.

NOTE.—These figures do not include tobacco and cigars imported for use of the Army or Navy.

I am sure that an examination of these tables will satisfy any fair-minded person that there is absolutely no danger whatever to the United States from the competition of the Philippine Islands in any line of the tobacco industry. So far as leaf tobacco is concerned, I call the attention of the Members to the fact that of 16,276,266 pounds exported from the Philippine Islands last year 13,455,065 pounds went to Spain and not a pound to the United States; indeed, practically all of this tobacco went to Spain and to the monopoly countries of Europe, and it is a striking comment upon the fears of any grower in this country that Philippine tobacco will supplant his product that Mr. Shiffer, of the United Cigar Manufacturers Company, when asked before the committee whether in his enormous product of 400,000,000 cigars a year his company had ever imported and manufactured any Philippine tobacco, he replied that they had not. He admitted that they were looking for Habana and Sumatra, but that he had never even experimented with Philippine tobacco.

The fact of the case is, as will be admitted by the overwhelming majority of those who have used Philippine tobacco, that the domestic product of the United States is far superior in quality, and, to say the least, no higher in price than the Philippine tobacco—comparison being made with both products in their own home market—and that it would be impossible to import Philippine tobacco into the United States at 8¾ cents a pound duty for filler and 40¼ cents a pound duty for wrapper, except to satisfy the fads and fancies of a very small number of people who had acquired an oriental taste for that product.

I will insert in the RECORD here prices of the various samples of tobacco brought by me from Manila and now on exhibition in the lobby of the House. The large samples were furnished at my request by the Insular Company, and the prices are the average prices for the past five years, as taken from their books, and is the bale price.

The samples in envelopes are sorted leaves, furnished by the Yebanna Company, in Manila.

I also put with these prices extract from the Supplement of the Crop Reporter of the United States, published by authority of the Secretary of Agriculture, at Washington, December, 1905, page 77, showing average production and value of the tobacco crop of the States and Territories for the year 1905.

Large tobacco samples, Isabela de Luzon, in hands as taken from bales:

1. 1ª de 1904. Ysabela de Luzon: Eighteen cents, United States gold, per pound; average price during past five years.
2. 2ª de 1903. Ysabela de Luzon: Fifteen cents, United States gold, per pound; average price during past five years.
3. 3ª de 1903. Ysabela de Luzon: Twelve cents, United States gold, per pound; average price during past five years.
4. 4ª de 1903. Ysabela de Luzon: Nine cents, United States gold, per pound; average price during past five years.
5. 5ª de 1900. Ysabela de Luzon: Six and one-half cents, United States gold, per pound; average price during past five years.

But even if at the expiration of the Spanish treaty and the termination of the Spanish contract the entire export product should come to the United States, the effect would be imperceptible, based on the production of last year of 16,000,000 pounds total exports from the Philippine Islands, and over 800,000,000 pounds produced in this country, to say nothing of the importations of Sumatra and Cuban product consumed in addition to our own production.

Two dangers, however, seem to continually present themselves to our people. One the fear of increased production, and the other the cheap labor of the Orient and the employment of Chinese coolies in the industry.

With reference to the first let it be borne in mind that little or no tobacco is exported from the Philippine Islands, except from two provinces—Isabela and Cagayan—and from a very limited area in those provinces, and that it is practically the product of the bottom lands adjacent to the Cagayan River and fertilized by the slime and mud deposited upon this land in the annual overflow. So that there is not the slightest occasion for fear of any increased area of production, for in the remainder of the archipelago, as in the Sandwich Island group, it has been demonstrated beyond question that good tobacco can not be grown within a distance of about 20 miles from the seacoast, unless it may be in some sheltered valleys which are so situated that they do not feel the effect of the salt air. I know of no tobacco grown in Connecticut within 20 miles of salt water, and I know from personal observation in Porto Rico that the best tobacco in the island is grown in and about Cayez, in the center of the island. Furthermore, the small area of the Philippine Islands available for agricultural land being only about 9½ per cent of the total acreage, and the insignificance of the industry, compared with the other export products of the islands, make it impossible that the production could ever be largely increased, except by improved cultivation of the present area and, possibly, fertilization in the years to come when prosperity shall have made this possible.

In round numbers for export, the hemp product of the islands last year amounted to $22,000,000, sugar four millions, and cocoanut and tobacco less than two millions each. Furthermore, the labor question, which is the unsolved problem of the East to-day, makes it certain that the development of these islands, during the life of the present generation at least, is bound to be in those directions where the least labor is required, as in the growth and cultivation of orchard products like hemp and cocoanut, rather than of field products, such as sugar and tobacco, and that any help which is extended to the islands toward a general prosperity must be given to those industries which need it most—tobacco and sugar—rather than to the others which will take care of themselves.

It is claimed by some that the lowering of the duty on cigars puts the American workman in competition with a cheap class of labor in the Orient, and efforts have been made before the committee and in other places to show that Chinese coolies are employed in this industry in Manila. A greater mistake could not have been made by the opponents of this bill. I have heard these statements and received these communications with great surprise, for in four of the largest factories in Manila which I visited this summer I did not see one Chinaman employed, and I respectfully refer all who entertain this fear to the census statistics of the islands. These persons do not seem to understand that Chinese exclusion and alien contract labor laws exist in the Philippines, and that upon the demand of the Filipinos as well as Americans they are even more vigorously enforced there than they are here.

I called upon the Bureau of Insular Affairs in the War Department to submit the figures to me with reference to the two matters, that of the number of laborers employed and the nationality of the same, and also the rate of wages paid, and shall insert the replies on both subjects with my remarks in the RECORD.

WAR DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF INSULAR AFFAIRS,
Washington, December 21, 1905.

Mr. HILL: In looking over the Philippine census report I find the following statistics relating to tobacco in the Philippines:

Page 113 of volume 2: There are 1,714 cigarette makers, which is less than 0.1 per cent of the total number of wage-earners; 11,036 cigar makers, which is 0.4 per cent of the total of wage-earners.

Page 116 of volume 2: "So far as the number of operatives is an index, the cigar and cigarette industry in the islands was about on a par with that of the United States, the proportion of wage-earners being equal in both countries and much less than in Porto Rico (1.2 per cent) and far less than in Cuba (3.9 per cent). The operatives in the Philippines were as to sex in the proportion of 29 males to 71 females."

Page 985 of volume 2: In the table showing the civilized population engaged in the principal gainful occupations it appears that there are 1,714 cigarette makers, classified by sex and color as follows: Brown, 448 males, 1,263 females; mixed, no males and 1 female; yellow, 1 male and 1 female; white and black, none of either sex, and that there are 11,036 cigar makers, classified by sex and color as follows: Brown, 3,168 males and 7,764 females; mixed, 9 males and 24 females; yellow, 29 males and 1 female; white, 38 males and no females; black, 3 males and no females.

Page 486 of volume 4: In the table showing the relative importance of manufacturing industries in the Philippines it is shown that the manufacture of cigars, cigarettes, and tobacco is graded as seventh, with 108 establishments, distributed in 10 provinces, the productions of which are valued at 8,698,634 pesos, 1 peso being equivalent to 50 cents United States currency.

Page 496 of volume 4: In the table showing the summary of manufacturing establishments it is indicated that there are 108 tobacco, cigar, and cigarette establishments, with a capital of 4,485,503 pesos, and 5 smoking-tobacco establishments, with a capital of 14,900 pesos.

Very sincerely,

FRANK MCINTYRE.

Hon. E. J. HILL,
Representative in Congress.

P. S.—In the third paragraph, as to color, brown refers to the Filipinos, mixed to the mestizos or half-castes, yellow to the Chinese, white to the Americans and Europeans, and black to the American negro.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF INSULAR AFFAIRS,

SIR: Referring to conversation with reference to wages paid workmen in cigar factories in the Philippine Islands, I have the honor to inform you that the census of the Philippine Islands shows that prior to 1898 and in 1902 the following wages (local currency) were paid, and while I regret to state that we haven't an official statement of the rate of wages paid now, it is very generally known that the wages of employees in the Philippine Islands have, up to the present time, increased steadily since American occupation, and that at present the wages received are considerably greater than those indicated in the census report for 1902:

	Average wages paid prior to 1898 (pesos).[a]		Average wages paid in 1902 (pesos).[a]

[a] Take one-half of these rates for value in American gold.

Very respectfully,

FRANK MCINTYRE.

Hon. EBENEZER J. HILL,
House of Representatives.

So far as Chinese labor is concerned, in the census of the year 1902 out of 1,714 cigarette makers all but 2 were Filipinos, there being of the Chinese 1 male and 1 female. Of the 11,036 cigar makers, there were of Chinese 29 males and 1 female; of whites, 38 males, and of negroes, 3 males. In other words, there were 8 more white cigar makers than there were Chinese, and only 71 of any other nationality than Filipino. But last February Mr. A. Determan, appointed by the cigar manufacturers and workmen of Manila to represent them before the Ways and Means Committee, made a statement in writing, found on page 231 of the hearings, in which he says, "There is not one Chinese cigar maker in Manila, to correct a false statement to the contrary." I am entirely satisfied from personal observation that the statement is correct. I stood at the gate of the Oriente factory one Saturday afternoon during the past summer and saw the employees, 1,400 in number, pass out at the close of the week's work, and a more clean, orderly, intelligent-looking body of employees it would be difficult to find anywhere outside of the United States. They were all Filipinos.

It will be noticed also from the letters submitted that the wages quoted are in pesos, the average being given during the Spanish occupation and since. They include men and women and relate to Manila, where 99 per cent of the cigars and 96 per cent of the cigarettes are produced. Before the Americans took the islands the wages of a cigar maker averaged 40 cents a day; in 1902, the census year, $1 a day, and it is well known that there has been a material advance since, to the advantage of all concerned. The fact of the case is that the work is practically all of it piecework, and the wages depend largely upon the skill and experience of the employee and the character and quality of the work upon which he is engaged. I saw men working on first-class cigars and earning from $1.50 to $2 a day gold, but I think it will be generally admitted that the fair average cost of manufacturing a thousand cigars of the different grades and qualities in Manila has been in past years about $7 a thousand, as against $12 in the United States. Of course, there are special brands in both places which far exceed these figures. This makes an average difference of $5 a thousand in the labor cost.

During the holiday recess I have been making some further inquiries with reference to the American cost and have been shown the actual pay rolls of three different establishments. In one, where nine-tenths of the product was of the ordinary 5-cent cigar, the labor cost was $6.63 per thousand. In another factory, where two-thirds of the product was the regular 10-cent cigar, the actual cost was $11.20 per thousand, and in the third case, where nothing but Habana tobacco was used and none but Cuban workmen were employed, the labor cost was $19.81 per thousand. The average labor cost of the three factories was $12.55 per thousand. I am satisfied that the daily production of the average American workman is far beyond that of the average Filipino, but, basing my conclusion on these pay rolls, I seriously question whether the cost of hand-made cigars of American style and fine grade is much, if any, less in Manila to-day than it is in the United States. I understand that the claim is made by the United Cigar Company that with the machinery used by them the entire cost of making the cigars in common use in this country, including all processes, from the prepared leaf to the finished cigar packed in boxes, does not exceed $5 per thousand, and I have the best of reasons for believing that this is true. If it is, the hand maker here and his fellow-worker in Manila, where no machines are used, have far more to fear from the trusts, who are opposing this bill, in this country than they have of competition between themselves, for that they can and should control by the power of their trade organizations. But, be the difference more or less, it is indisputable that at the present time it is covered several times over by the protection given under the provisions of this bill, by which 25 per cent of the Dingley rates are continued in force for a period of three years. Indeed, with the United States as with practically all other nations, the import duty on cigars has been far and away beyond the point of protection, and based—and justly so—on the principle of taxing a luxury for purposes of revenue.

Let me illustrate. Take the most expensive cigar in the islands, the Pigtail, manufactured by the Tobacoleria Company, and sold at the factory at wholesale at 25 cents apiece gold. The duty and internal-revenue tax would be $52.37 a thousand.

On the Unico brand, made by the Germinal factory, selling at 15 cents apiece gold, wholesale, in Manila, the customs duty and internal-revenue tax would be $37.12 gold per thousand. On the American Beauty brand, made by the same company, and selling for 10 cents gold in Manila, and which approaches nearer in size, taste, and style to an American cigar than any other which I saw in the islands, the duty and internal-revenue tax would be $25 per thousand. Take the ordinary Perfecto, made by the same company and selling at wholesale at $30 a thousand gold, and which has a labor cost in the Philippine Islands of $7 per thousand, the duties and internal revenue would be $27.37, and for acceptability to the American people it would not even be considered in comparison with the ordinary 5-cent cigar in this country, to say nothing of the fact that it would be wholly impossible under the terms of this bill to import it.

Go still lower and take the ordinary cigar of the masses of the people of the Philippine Islands, known as the "Londres brand," a cigar that in my judgment under no circumstances whatever could be sold within the limits of the United States, and the duty and internal revenue under the terms of this bill on that brand of cigars would be $21.12 a thousand.

Indeed, considering the quality of the cheap cigars of the islands, there is no more fear of their becoming competitors in our market than there is of the family cigar of northern Luzon, where I am told that a cigar is made from 1 to 2 feet long and, suspended by a cord from the roof, hangs in the center of the hut, always ready for common and promiscuous smoking by the whole family and visiting friends.

In every case, from the top to the bottom, the duties exceed several times over the difference in labor cost, on the basis of the present scale of wages.

I think it is demonstrated beyond dispute that under the terms of the bill for the next three years not the slightest fear of competition should exist. But there is another claim which is made, and that is that we are helping foreign manufacturers. Here equally as great a mistake is made, for of the fifty-eight factories in Manila, large and small, twenty-four of them are owned by Filipinos and use Filipino capital, fourteen are owned by Europeans, one by an American negro, and nineteen are said to be owned by Chinese merchants, and employ Chinese capital but Filipino workmen. Of the four which I visited, one was German, one English, one Spanish, and one Filipino, and my judgment is that these four make more cigars than all the rest of the factories in the islands put together, for they certainly employ more people than can be found in all the rest of the them.

It is true that foreign capital to a very considerable extent is invested in the cigar and cigarette industry of the Philippine Islands, but the one thing that the islands need for their development over and above all others is capital, and if Americans will not go there and invest their money, certainly criticism should not be made of people from other parts of the world who choose to avail themselves of the opportunity. It is hardly fair, however, to say that the effect of this bill will benefit the investments of foreign manufacturers in Manila to the detriment of American capital at home, in view of the fact that when I was at Manila last summer it was made known to me that quite a number of foreign manufacturers, including both German and Spanish, were protesting most emphatically against the passage of this bill on the ground that it was going to be detrimental to them, and there was presented to Senator Scott, as presiding officer at the hearings at Manila, a memorial of these manufacturers protesting against this change in the tariff on the ground that it was to be injurious to their business. They admit in that memorial that the industry is in a precarious condition, but hold that the abolition of the duties into the United States will make it worse rather than improve it, for they claim that in the first place the price of their leaf tobacco will advance considerably, and that wages will be largely increased; that the American people will not smoke Manila cigars, and that they will be in far greater danger of losing their trade in the Orient than of gaining a market here, and they close their memorial with a statement that the only way to improve the cigar industry is by a vast and very possible improvement of the Manila leaf tobacco.

I do not wholly concur in their view of the case, nor do the Filipino manufacturers, for they were strongly of the opinion that in so far as lower duties and ultimate free trade gave an alternative market in the United States, by just so much they could be benefited by lifting the price of their present product in their present channels of trade in the Orient, and that they would be gradually relieved of the difficulties in connection with the industry if they were placed in a position where they could meet a very peculiar condition of affairs existing not only in the Orient to-day, but throughout the civilized world, and that is the ability to meet the fashion in cigars as well as to compete in price, for, as we all know, the use of tobacco is governed fully as much by fad and fashion as it is by price. That the cigar industry in the Philippine Islands is at a low ebb can easily be seen by reference to Table No. 1, and it only needs calling attention to one feature of it to show the reason why. It will be seen there that in the banner year of the Philippines in the cigar industry since the American occupation cigars to the value of $1,666,722 were exported in 1902, and that since that time in no year have the exports of cigars equaled a million dollars. The Filipino manufacturers of Manila claim, and I think claim rightly, that the falling off in their trade in the last three years has averaged 42 per cent, and that it is due to the utter inability of the Philippine Islands to produce a light-colored cigar, which the Tobacco Leaf Journal of this country admits to be a craze all over the world, and which is certainly working its full effect in the Orient, as it is here.

That this is one of the great troubles of the tobacco product of the Philippine Islands is clearly shown by the fact that the larger manufacturers of cigars in Manila on the 18th of May last made an agreement, the terms of which will be found in the internal revenue commissioner's report for this year. It provides that there shall be a fixed standard of grading, and that they shall buy only of the planters and at fair appraisement. It eliminates the Chinese itinerant trader by declaring that no brokers or middlemen of any kind whatever shall be employed and that no lots shall be purchased at lump prices, not even from the planters themselves.

If this agreement can be maintained it will at least make honest grading. In Appendix P of the same report will be found a memorandum furnished by the Tobacoleria Company, which sheds much light upon the peculiar conditions with reference to the tobacco situation in the provinces of Cagayan and Isabela, page 168, Internal Revenue Report. This shows that, taking five successive crops as a basis, there is an annual yield there of 200,000 quintals, practically equivalent to 20,000,000 pounds, or about equal to the product of a single county in Pennsylvania. It gives the proportion of the tobacco that can be utilized as follows:

Class A, for wrappers, 10 per cent, but only one-half of 1 per cent being suited for fine-grade cigars.

Classes B and C, for fillers and cut tobacco, etc., 90 per cent.

I quote further from the sixth clause of this memorandum:

There is great difficulty in meeting the demand for the different "claro" (and "oscuro") colors through the scarcity of wrappers. The demand for "claro" wrappers is greater day after day, for where in the Philippines "maduro" was formerly sold, now only "claro" is demanded. There has been much decrease in the production of light-colored, clean, nice leaves of fine texture since the discontinuance of the monopoly. Since that time tobacco-leaf culture began to be neglected, and especially has this been the case since 1900, owing to raise in prices and to local competition.

In view of this condition of affairs, it was not a surprise, particularly to me, to find the manufacturers of the Philippine Islands experimenting with Sumatra and light-colored United States wrappers, and to hear the earnest plea of one of the manufacturers that whatever action was taken by the home government in regard to the tariff on their product coming into the United States that they might at least be permitted to have access, free of duty, to the United States product of light-colored wrapper tobacco.

I found one factory where they had been experimenting with five cases of Connecticut wrappers. The first case was bought at 50 cents a pound, and so much satisfaction had from it that a second purchase of four cases was made at 55 cents a pound. In addition to this a duty of 23 cents and expenses of shipment halfway around the world brought this domestic wrapper of ours to their hands at a practical cost of 80 cents a pound. The manager of the Yebanna Factory, at Manila, said to me, with an earnestness that was almost pitiful, that the Manila factories were rapidly losing their hold on the oriental trade because of German and Dutch competition with cigars made from German and Holland filler covered with light-colored Sumatra wrappers, and that he was fully satisfied that if he could get United States wrappers free of duty he could not only meet that competition, but with them could drive Germany out of the Orient. I am fully satisfied that he is correct in his conclusions and that the pending bill will open up a very considerable market in the Philippine Islands for the wrapper tobacco of Florida, Georgia, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, New York, Connecticut, and other States of the Union, as the Porto Rican market has already begun to be opened up, and that in the end it will be of great advantage to our tobacco growers, with no detriment whatever to any other branch of the industry.

I desire to call the attention of the growers of other States to the fact that it is a necessity that we should be looking about for such a market for our wrapper tobacco, as shown by the testimony of Mr. J. L. McFarlin, of Florida, where, on page 146 of the hearings on this bill, he states concerning the growing of shade-grown wrappers in Florida, Alabama, and Texas as follows:

If given the same protection that we have enjoyed in the past, in a few years these three States that I have mentioned above will produce enough tobacco of the finer grades, comparing with Sumatra, to supply the United States.

If this is true, and I have no doubt of it, it behooves the growers of the Northern States now to so legislate that the shortage of fine wrappers in the Philippines may be supplied from the coming surplus here.

That such a market is possible now to the wrapper-leaf growers of the United States is clearly shown by the statement of one of the largest manufacturers in Manila concerning the operations of his company last year. He said that the best tobacco was the Isabela. Last year they bought 25,000 quintals of that tobacco, worth 9½ cents gold on the average. Out of this they selected 6,000 quintals generally fit for wrappers. The remaining 19,000 quintals they sold to the cigarette factories at prices which brought the wrapper bales up to a net cost to themselves of 30 cents per pound. From these 6,000 quintals he claimed to have gotten 60 per cent of wrappers, taking 100 pounds of this tobacco costing $30, deducting 40 pounds of filler at 9½ cents, $3.80, it leaves 60 pounds of wrapper costing $26.20, or 43.7 cents per pound.

It takes 8 to 10 pounds of such tobacco to wrap 1,000 cigars, but to be absolutely safe figure it at 7 pounds, which at 43.7 cents per pound would amount to $3.06. Of this, 4 pounds would be clippings and cuttings, which would go into filler, and should be figured at 9½ cents and deducted, 38 cents, making net cost of wrappers for 1,000 cigars $2.68.

He said that according to his own experience 4 pounds of light Connecticut wrapper would do the same work, and without making any allowance for clippings they could afford to pay 68 cents per pound for light wrappers, delivered free of duty in Manila, even in competition with their own tobacco.

But they do not have enough of their own, and must look elsewhere for a supply, even at a higher price.

Sumatra wrappers cost, duty paid, in Manila $1.50 gold per pound, and at 2 pounds per thousand the cost would be $3 per thousand, or 32 cents more than Isabela tobacco, or equal to a price of 75 cents per pound for our wrapper delivered there, which, of course, is impossible with the existing duty.

Under these circumstances I can not but concur with the Manila manufacturers, that if United States wrapper tobacco had the same privileges and protection in the Manila market which it has in our own it would not only prove to be a great boon to the Manila manufacturers, but it would ultimately result in considerable advantage to the several States here, both North and South, where wrapper tobacco is produced.

As a purely commercial proposition, then, this legislation will result:

First. In broadening the market for our domestic wrapper leaf, giving to the growers a higher price, or, what is more probable, causing an increased production.

Second. To a slight extent in increasing the very small importation of Philippine cigars, by permitting Americans who have resided in the Philippines and acquired a taste for them to purchase them here at a reasonable advance over the domestic cigar, where now the duty is prohibitory.

Third. And by far the most important, in a stimulus given to the industry in the Philippines which, coupled with the efforts of the manufacturers there, will result in better methods of cultivation, curing, and marketing the crop, which will in time vastly improve the quality of the Philippine tobacco and its products and without which I honestly believe that the industry is doomed to a slow but certain death, for it does not need an expert now to see that they are not only losing their export trade, but will soon be unable to hold their own home market for high-grade goods.

Fourth. In giving to the Philippines alternative markets in America and the Orient for high-grade products at increased prices, for this is the only possible offset to an increased labor cost which is sure to follow a general improvement in Philippine industries.

But aside from any commercial consideration and above and beyond them all is the existence of a national conscience which will not long permit the American Congress to legislate for both sides of this question without doing equal and exact justice to all, and especially for the side which can not help itself. Poor, tax-ridden Spain held her colony with an iron hand, but gave to its products a preferential of 80 per cent in her own tariff rates. For us to destroy that preferential by wresting the sovereignty from Spain and then to refuse as generous terms to them as a helpless dependency of this great nation would give the lie to every claim which we are now making of our right to stand in the forefront of the nations of the world as the best exponent of a genuine Christian civilization.

Mr. Chairman, last summer, when the Taft party were at Manila, there came into the hearings there a resident of the province of Panay, a province which, in opposition to the Tagalog insurrection of Aguinaldo and his followers, organized a Visayan republic and transferred their allegiance to the American flag. He was a gentleman in every sense of the word, polished, refined, cultivated, educated at a Paris university, a fluent linguist, speaking French, Spanish, English, and Visayan, and gifted with an oratorical power which would make him a brilliant ornament of any parliamentary assembly in the world. Let me quote from memory the substance of his opening remarks: Said he:

> Before entering upon the discussion of the subject upon which I am to speak I wish to ask a question or two. Are we a part of the American nation, or are we not? We welcome American sovereignty and bow with reverence to the nation's flag. Why are we not accorded the same treatment that you extend to Hawaii and Porto Rico?
> Again, you have put upon your statute books a law which will go into operation on the 1st of July, 1906, providing that the ports of these islands shall thereafter be domestic ports, and that none but American ships shall ply between these islands and the mainland. If the ports here and there are to be domestic ports, open only to domestic ships, why are not the products of these islands domestic products and entitled to all the privileges which the products of any other part of the great American Republic now have, including free entry into your domestic markets?

Mr. Chairman, whenever the Members of this House shall have answered those two questions fully, frankly, and conscientiously, I for one will have no fear whatever concerning the passage of this bill. [Loud applause.]

During the delivery of the foregoing, the following occurred:

Mr. ALEXANDER. When you found out that there had not been a pound of tobacco imported into this country from the Philippine Islands, were you surprised at that fact?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Not at all, after I found the quality of tobacco that was raised there.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That was the reason, was it not, because the people who otherwise would have imported it had seen the tobacco and smoked it?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Why, certainly.

Mr. CASSEL. You said a little while ago that under Spanish rule the Philippine tobacco was very much better in quality than it is now?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Yes.

Mr. CASSEL. Will they not produce as good a quality of tobacco later on as they produced under the Spanish régime?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I hope so. If they do not, their industry is doomed. But I want to say this, that many of our people have the same fear with regard to this matter that our sugar friends have. Our sugar friends figure on the production of sugar in the world and compare it with the consumption at the present time. Now, in my judgment, it is impossible for the Philippine Islands for the next twenty years, and probably longer, to much increase their production of sugar, and by that time we will be using from three to four million tons more than we consume now. The advancement of the United States in the consumption of these tropical products is infinitely beyond the increased supply of the United States, and a quarter of a century from now, when we have 40,000,000 more people in this country and are using 3,000,000 tons more of sugar, where can we get it from? All the possible production of sugar in the Philippine Islands sinks into insignificance compared with this increased consumption.

Mr. MADDEN. Can the gentleman tell the House what it costs to produce a pound of beet sugar?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I do not know anything about beet sugar. When I was in the Philippine Islands I gave my entire attention to the tobacco industry and made no critical analysis of the sugar question at all. I have not studied it, and I do not think it is necessary for me to go into that question after the magnificent speech made day before yesterday by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman was referring to sugar a moment ago, and I thought he could answer the question.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. PERKINS. I should like to ask a question for my own information.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. Who are the people that manufacture the cigars?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. The largest manufacturers in the United States, I think, are the United Cigar Company.

Mr. PERKINS. I mean in the Philippines.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I will come to that. I will cover that point in my remarks on the subject.

Mr. CASSEL. I have here a report which says that there has not been a pound of tobacco imported into the Philippines from the United States for the last two or three years.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Well, there are a dozen gentlemen here who saw the tobacco and cigars made from it, and I saw the bill of shipment from New York. I am satisfied that he is correct in his conclusions.

Mr. LILLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I had a conversation with the gentleman from Connecticut, in which he said that I might interrupt him.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. That is correct, I am glad to answer the gentleman.

Mr. LILLEY of Pennsylvania. Most of these questions have been answered quite satisfactorily. I understand the gentleman from Connecticut to say now that this bill will not aid the Filipinos in the sale of their tobacco.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I think it will aid them, but I think it will be a long process.

Mr. LILLEY of Pennsylvania. Let me go a little further. This is the problem that agitates the minds of those in my country who are raising tobacco. They think—those who school their own children and wear good clothes, and whose daughters take music lessons, and who work with their hands, and who plant from one to three acres of tobacco—they think that they ought not to be put in competition with those who have scarcely passed the fig-leaf problem. Now, the gentleman from Connecticut has answered that completely if he says to me that this does not bring them into competition with leaf tobacco.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I submitted the prices of tobacco selling there and the prices of tobacco selling here, and I can not see how it is possible, even with free trade, for competition to exist on these prices. Furthermore, the question of quality stands as an insuperable bar to sending Philippine tobacco into the United States now.

I hope, I sincerely hope for the benefit of these people, that in time they may be able to improve the quality of their tobacco, but long before they will reach that point of course the consumption in the United States, with its enormous population, will more than take that up if it should all come here, and we would never feel it. You would not know it any more than if you poured a bucket of water into the sea. But immediately, or in the near future, there is no possible competition.

Mr. LILLEY of Pennsylvania. One more question. Coming to the basis of absolute free trade between this country and the islands, how will it affect the products there?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. That is a question I am coming to directly.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the Clerk to now read the extract which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the hearing before the Committee of Ways and Means January 27, Secretary Taft, in the testimony submitted, in speaking of the fears of the cigar makers, when a similar bill was under consideration, as to the effect of the proposed legislation, said: "There may be some justification for the apprehension of the cigar makers that this measure would injure them. I admit that a Perfection-shaped cigar, for which the cigar makers in this country receive $34 per thousand for making, is made in the Philippine Islands for $6 per thousand."

According to Secretary Taft, this shows a difference of $28 per thousand in the price of making them. He also said the same cigar was sold for $100 per thousand here, while a like cigar from the Philippine Islands can be laid down here at a price of $45 per thousand.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, all the reply I have to make to that is that when this same thing was said and read—for it was read—in the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means, the chairman requested that the gentleman should publish the whole statement of Secretary Taft and not part of it, and it will all be found in the hearings—the additional statement of Secretary Taft.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Are they manufacturing now as good cigars in the Philippine Islands as they were when Secretary Taft made that statement?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I do not know. I have not examined the case at all. I question very much whether there is a cigar made in the United States where the labor costs $34 a thousand. If the gentleman will take the printed hearings, he will see his question entirely answered there, without taking up the time of the House to do it over again.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, from the emphasis placed upon a few words by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LILLEY], I take it he is laboring under a misapprehension of facts relative to the defrayal of the expense of educating these Filipinos.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. It is all done by taxation upon the Filipinos, except that we return to them the tonnage dues and the import taxes received in this country from their importations here. That goes back, and we bear the cost of that education in so far as it tends to increase the prices of their products when they are offered in the markets of this country. It is indirect—just the same as an indirect addition that comes from any customs duties from any part of the world.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. As a matter of fact, the improvements in the harbor, the improvements of the wharves, the improvements of the roads, as I understand it, are all paid for by money collected in the Philippine Islands, and that money does not come out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. The sewers are paid for by issuing the bonds of the city, just the same as in Indianapolis. It is not a burden on the United States at all.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. It does not come out of the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Absolutely not.

Mr. LILLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this is our complaint and one that we have had, that you are trying to raise money for the Philippine Islands and you are assessing the sugar growers and the tobacco growers; and if they need it, why not pass the hat and all pay a little?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I would say to the gentleman that it would be bad enough to do that in an American civilization, but to do it in a community which I have described, 80 per cent of whom can not even read, the result would be disastrous; and I submit to the gentleman himself whether it would not be wiser to stimulate the industry of these people and let it come from their own revenues and have them feel that they were doing it themselves, rather than by a direct payment out of our Treasury, I think that was one of the great mistakes in our dealings with Porto Rico two or three years ago, when we paid money out of the Treasury in a lump sum for them to distribute. It would have been much wiser to do it the other way.

Mr. LILLEY of Pennsylvania. But what about the poor sugar grower and the poor tobacco grower, if it is true that they are to be compelled to pay all?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Oh, the hemp industry pays its share and the cocoanut industry pays its share and the merchants pay their share. Do you mean in the United States?

Mr. LILLEY of Pennsylvania. Yes; they are complaining that you are assessing that upon them by this bill.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. In this country?

Mr. LILLEY of Pennsylvania. In this bill.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. My judgment is that they will never know there is any such thing done.

Mr. LILLEY of Pennsylvania. I hope not, but that is what they complain of.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I think the Filipinos will know it, but I do not think the people in the United States will ever know there has been any change in the law.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has described with great particularity the condition of the people and the industrial condition in the islands to-day, and the gentleman predicates his opinion that no longer will come to this country because of that backward condition. Does the gentleman think that condition will maintain after an opportunity has been afforded for American capital to go into the islands and after the protection of this bill has been given to the islands?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I would like very much to have American capital go there. I am hopeless in regard to it. I can not find any to amount to anything there now. I would be very glad if it did, and my honest judgment, as I said a while ago, is that before any effective change could be wrought in the industry to which the gentleman refers, the sugar industry, that our increased consumption will be so great that it never will be noticed, and I do not think it will be noticed now. Now, I can not comprehend, with seventeen hundred thousand tons of sugar bought from foreign nations, why any American would object to buying one hundred thousand from our own people and sixteen hundred thousand from foreigners instead of buying the whole of that amount from foreigners. I can not understand what the motive can be that lies back of an action of that kind. We have to buy seventeen hundred thousand tons from Jamaica, Java, Sumatra, and other countries in addition to what we raise and can get from Porto Rico. Why the Louisiana and the beet sugar industry should object—what earthly harm there can be in buying 100,000 tons from the Philippines and buying only sixteen hundred thousand in the foreign markets—I can not understand.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Now, if American capital does go in there the production will be very much larger than 100,000 tons, will it not?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I have just now replied to that question, that while I would be very glad to have American capital go there, I do not find it there now and have very little expectation of it in the immediate future.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, before I begin my remarks I wish to apologize to the House for beginning at this late hour Saturday afternoon the discussion of a matter of such importance, the proper presentation of which will of necessity consume some time. The House will recall that at the beginning of this discussion I suggested that those opposed to the bill would like to have some reasonable time for the presentation of their side of the case. Up to this time, after three days of debate, the presentation of the Filipino side of the question has occupied all of the time, with the exception of two hours in the shank of the evening yesterday, and the American side of the question, the question as it affects the American farmer and producer, has had the latter end of last evening, and now we are graciously allowed the short end of this evening. I would prefer to address the House at some other time, but it seems that there is no possibility of securing time to discuss this question from the standpoint of the American producer, except after the House has listened to prolonged debate on the other side.

Mr. Chairman, I approach this question from the standpoint of an American citizen, mindful of all the duties and obligations we may owe the Filipino people by reason of the relationship existing between those islands and our country. I also approach it recalling the quoted remarks of the gentleman, who has been held up to our commendation here and lauded as a patriot, Señor de la Rama, to the effect that charity does and should begin at home, and mindful that we have high authority for the truth that he who does not care for those of his own national household "is worse than an infidel." Holding the views I do, I must necessarily approach the question from the standpoint of a protectionist, and a stand-pat protectionist at that. I have heard much of late of the virtue of standing pat, and if that be a virtue I think that this is a most excellent time to exercise it. [Applause.]

There may be some who will challenge my position on the ground that it will be claimed that this is a party question and therefore should have the support of Republicans.

In defense of my position I want to refer briefly to some of the history of our party and of its action relative to a great agricultural industry, which, in my opinion, is threatened with destruction by this measure. It should be recalled that the beet-sugar industry—for I shall confine my remarks entirely or almost wholly to the effect which I believe this measure will have on that industry, leaving the discussion of its effect upon other lines of industry to men better qualified than I am to discuss them—that the beet-sugar industry of the United States is a child of Republican legislation—protective legislation. Under our legislation, State and national, it had its birth and its splendid growth, and it developed steadily and rapidly until that unlucky day when we "did something for Cuba," when we traded for twenty additional millions of Cuban trade fifteen millions of good hard cash which would have otherwise gone into the Treasury of the United States.

I voted for that measure. I voted for it because I understood that it was a finality so far as legislation reducing the tariff on sugar was concerned. I believed we owed something to Cuba. I feared that if we did not give her some little relief from the condition which war and the low price of sugar—much lower than now—had placed her in that there would be trouble down there. We might have to intervene and thus annex, and then we should be threatened with what this bill proposes—free trade in sugar with a tropical sugar country—so I took the Cuban 20 per cent reduction as the lesser of two evils.

If any of the other gentlemen who voted for it and supported it can derive any satisfaction or comfort from their vote on that measure, they have the advantage of me. [Applause.] I know of no place on earth where it has cost 75 per cent for new business, except in the case of the insurance companies which they have been investigating in New York and in our trade with Cuba under reciprocity.

In the year 1896 we took the Democracy to task "for not keeping faith with the sugar producers of the country," though they had given them a protection of 40 per cent. In 1900 we renewed our pledges to that splendid industry in our platform and in our campaign book, which was the Bible of those of us who fought under the Republican banner, we declared, after referring to the attitude of the party in placing a duty upon Porto Rican products of 15 per cent, when, let it be remembered, the Philippines were ours, that that action—was an explicit declaration by the Republican party that it proposed to retain the power to fix such tariff as it might deem judicious against the products of cheap tropical labor wherever located or under whatever conditions.

In other words, it was a distinct promise to the farmer that he need not fear the Republican party would permit the cheap labor and the cheap sugar of any tropical territory to be brought in in a manner which would destroy the infant industry of beet-sugar production.

The illustrious author of the Dingley bill stated on this floor, during the discussion of the bill that bears his name and which it is now proposed to mutilate, that the time had "come when the production of our own sugar from the beet ought to be and can be successfully entered upon," and that "we will not disturb our tariff in the next quarter of a century." Gentlemen then and now leaders on this floor time and again, during the debates relating to Porto Rico and to Cuba and the Philippines, gave assurance, direct and implied, that their influence would be exerted against further reduction in the duty on sugar than the reduction of 25 per cent to the Philippine Islands and the reduction of 20 per cent to Cuba.

The gentleman from New York, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, in presenting this bill to the House day before yesterday, said:

At that date—

April 11, 1909—

we are to place the Philippines upon the same plane as all the territory of the United States as far as the tariff is concerned.

Did the gentleman mean just that? I can not think so. He was not happy in his expression; for we are not placing the Philippines on the same plane as our people here at home under the terms of this bill. We are making of them pampered, and we will ultimately make of them spoiled, children of the Republic. We give them all the markets of this great nation free, the greatest markets the world has ever known, and then we allow them to place their tariff on goods going from foreign countries to their ports and collect and keep the revenue. If this bill does the Filipino any good at all, so far as the sugar industry is concerned, it will build up princely haciendas over there; it will call for the investment of millions of dollars in machinery, and while we give the Filipino a bounty of $1.20 on every hundred pounds of sugar he brings here, the American manufacturer takes his chances with the world in furnishing the machinery needed for the building up of the industry. You take the sugar industry from Michigan and Colorado and California and plant it in Luzon and Negros and bar the American manufacturer from participation in the benefits of its growth.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MONDELL. I will, gladly.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like the gentleman to state, if he can, what it costs to make a pound of sugar in the Philippines?

Mr. MONDELL. I will try to reach that.

Mr. MADDEN. Just a moment. I would also like to have him state what it costs to transport it from the Philippines to the United States—what it costs per ton for duty and then what it costs to make a ton of beet sugar refined; then what the ton of sugar sells for. I ask this because I want to see what the commercial difference between the two propositions is.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, my time is limited, but I will try to answer all of those questions in just a few moments. The Philippine duty on agricultural machinery, including sugar machinery, is 5 per cent, less than the difference in the freight rate as between New York and Manila, and London and Hamburg and the same port, and if this bill becomes a law and if it does anything helpful for the Filipino, if it helps him to build up his industry, the German or the Englishman will furnish every dollar's worth of machinery that goes into the plantations there, will they not? And could this occur in the continental territory of the United States? Can Colorado or Alaska or Arizona import English or German machinery at 5 per cent duty and then keep the 5 per cent? Is not the gentleman mistaken about "the same plane" proposition?

The gentleman from Connecticut should remember that when folks get to smoking Filipino cigars up his way—and they are pretty good, some of them, and mighty cheap—his cigar-making and tobacco-raising constituents are likely to be reminded that they are not only losing that much opportunity for labor and of market for their produce, but that at the same time they are helping to pay a high internal-revenue tax on those cigars, and that is going over to the islands to help build up and strengthen the industry there. Even the man who smokes may sometimes reflect that when he bought his cigar he not only paid a profit to Filipino tobacco raisers and cigar makers, but he actually taxed himself to raise the price to himself for the sole and exclusive benefit of the Filipino. The poverty-stricken widow, pouring the costly fluid into the alcohol lamp by the bedside of her sick child, is not likely to be cheered by the reflection that the greater portion of the cost, which her slender means can ill afford, is the internal-revenue tax which has gone to help relieve the wealthy Philippine landowner from the payment of taxes. And yet this is what they call putting the Philippines "on the same plane as all the territories of the United States."

We are going to give them every advantage in our market, a bounty of a dollar and twenty cents a hundred over the world's price of sugar, something that no extensive tropical cane-growing region ever had; destroy, or at least threaten the destruction of, our beet-sugar industry; give them a market, the greatest and best in the world, for their tobacco and their alcohol; tax ourselves with a high internal-revenue tax, collect it, and send it over to them, we praying the freight. And what do we get out of it? Market for our machinery? Oh, no. We would not want to hurt the feelings of the little brown brother by suggesting that we secure the same advantage that we have in the home market, but we take our chances with the balance of the world, with distance and freight rates against us, barring what consolation we can get out of the saving of 5 per cent ad valorem.

Is it possible that the Republic has reached that stage of its development when we must pay tribute to the revolutionary sentiment in the Philippine Islands? If not, what does this all mean? When we pay the internal-revenue tax on the Filipino's product used by our people; when we transfer an American industry to his shores, are we not paying tribute to the Moro and the Visayan and Togalog that he may not be restive under our government?

But, Mr. Chairman, they say this is not going to hurt us; that they are a poor, miserable, shiftless people; that the soil is unfertile, unproductive; no possibility of securing good labor, and no fertility in the soil to produce considerable crops. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] tells us that the soil is too poor to produce good sugar; the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] says that it is too rich to produce good tobacco. I presume they did not refer to the same soil. But they say there is not much good land over there any way, and gentlemen have claimed that the Philippine census contained a statement to the effect that only 9 per cent of the land in the Philippine Islands is arable and fit for agriculture. It is a curious thing that before this debate began a gentleman who saw me looking over the Philippine census said:

> Mind you, watch out during this debate, or some fellow will claim that the table of agricultural lands on page 181 of the census is all the arable lands there are in the islands.

I laughed at him, but the thing has happened—happened several times—during the debate, and I want to particularly call the attention of the House to this phase of the question, and if you are not satisfied that I am right get a copy of the Philippine census and satisfy yourself. Nowhere in the census is there any pretense of giving the total area of the arable lands of the archipelago. Everybody knows that it would be impossible to do anything of the sort in taking a census. Beginning with page 180 of the Philippine census, volume 4, are 18 tables and accompanying text relative to the "agricultural"—in other words, the farm lands—of the islands, and it is stated at the top of page 180 that these relate to "farms and other parcels of land used for agriculture." The total is given in Table 1, page 181, as 2,827,704 hectares, of 2½ acres each, or about 7,000,000 acres, and it will be noted that throughout all these tables—page 187, Table 7, under the head of "Farm areas"—on page 188 and elsewhere this area is given as the area in farms. On page 181 it is stated "the small proportion of land in farms or agricultural lands as compared with the total areas of the various provinces, commandancias, and islands, shown by the following tables."

In the pamphlet issued by the Philippine Commission relating to the public lands in 1905, pages 9 and 10, these same tables are used, with this explanation on page 10: "It is not known whether the land reported by the census as being in farms or agricultural lands includes all the lands in private ownership." Certainly all this ought to be sufficient evidence to anyone who desires to know the truth that this reference in the census is only to agricultural lands in private ownership.

Nobody knows, nor can they know until a careful classification is made there by the actual test of agriculture, how much arable land there is in the Philippines, but the last word of the Philippine government on this question is contained in the public land pamphlet to which I have referred, in which, on page 6, the total area of the islands is estimated at 73,000,000 acres—12,000,000 in private ownership, of which 12,000,000 the census, as stated before, gives a little over 7,000,000 as agricultural and in farms. Taking from the total area of 73,000,000 acres 12,000,000 in private ownership, and we have the estimate of the bureau of public lands of 61,000,000 acres of public lands. With regard to these lands the following statement is made: "The chief of the bureau of forestry estimates the forest lands on the public domain at about 40,000,000 acres. This would leave an area of 21,000,000 acres of land not forested, the most of which is agricultural in character and which will be subject to disposal under the law permitting leasing, selling, and homesteading as soon as the act now awaiting the final action of the Commission shall have received the express or implied sanction of Congress." So it seems that to the census 7,000,000 of agricultural lands we must, according to the bureau of public lands, add "the most" of 21,000,000 acres of public, arable lands, not timbered, and of course a considerable portion of the timbered lands would be good agricultural lands if cleared, and provision for the sale of such lands as agricultural lands is made in the Philippine land laws.

Secretary Taft said before the Insular Committee, while he was governor-general, "We are going to be a great sugar-producing archipelago," and he stated that, while the islands are a trifle smaller than Japan, "they have much more arable land and very much more rich soil." The report of the Philippine Commission for 1901 states: "The land is most fertile and for the most part naturally irrigated." Governor Wright, before the Senate Committee in 1902, said that in his opinion, and judging from what people who knew had told him, the Philippine sugar land was more fertile than Hawaii, where they have produced as high as 12 tons of sugar per acre. The Hawaiian Islands are so small that you could almost cover them with the palm of your hand, so to speak; contain but 100,000 acres of tillable land, and yet Hawaii produces over 400,000 tons of sugar.

Here is an archipelago, the fairest and most fertile in the Tropics; nearly as large as Japan, having six or eight times as much tillable land. Older from a geological standpoint, under the influence of 150 inches of rain per annum and the heat of tropical suns, her mountains have disintegrated, rank tropical vegetation has in the course of ages, mingling with the mineral elements, formed a soil of marvelous richness, so that agriculture can be carried on almost to the tops of many of her mountains. There are many wide valleys and vast stretches of fertile uplands. If there are no agricultural lands in the 60,000,000 acres we own over there, why in the name of high heaven did the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] bring in a bill for the disposition of public lands over there, and why does Secretary Taft say they ought to have 25,000 acres in a hacienda rather than 2,500? If there is not any land over there that is arable or tillable, why are we trying to impose on people by offering to dispose of the public land?

We all recall the rosy predictions made of the possibilities of these islands from an agricultural standpoint in other days. Gentlemen, they were not exaggerated; they were true. There are no islands in the tropic seas of the world equal to them. They contain eighteen times the area of Hawaii, which produces 400,000 tons of sugar per annum, and vastly more good lands in proportion; two and a half times larger than Java, which to-day could supply the United States with all the sugar she needs other than that she produces within her own territory. But they say they are poor, miserable, shiftless, no-account folk, and you can not make anything of them; and finally, in despair, at the last moment, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] said he could not hold any hope that this legislation would accomplish anything for them. Then, in heaven's name, how can they justify themselves in raising this menace to American industries if they are not going to help anybody by doing it? [Applause.]

What are the facts? The facts are that the Filipino is a wonderfully effective laborer. Every disinterested observer has said so, down to the time when in the interest of this legislation there went up this united official chorus of disparagement and detraction of the people, the climate, and the soil of those islands. Mr. Welborn, head of the agricultural bureau, in his report of 1904, states: "We have experienced no difficulty in securing all of the help we wanted." He says that at first they got them for 26 centavos (13 cents) a day, but that later, in order to secure more efficient help, they paid 15½ cents a day; and in that same report he gave the average wages of the mill hands on a plantation as $4 per month, the field hands $3 per month, and stated that the board of these men cost, in addition, about a peso per week, or 50 cents, making the cost of the mill hands, with board, 25 cents a day on the basis of a month of twenty-five working days, and the field hands 21 cents a day. But, taking the highest amount that has been stated by anyone of the cost of Philippine labor, it is ridiculously low compared with the $1.50 and $2.25 a day of the mill and field hands in American beet-sugar factories. Of course, it will be argued that this labor is nowhere nearly so efficient as the labor employed in connection with the American beet-sugar industry. Admit for the sake of argument that it is not—though much of the labor employed in the cultivation and preparation of beets is far from efficient, from the average American standard. In any event there can be no such thing in ordinary manual or even in semiskilled labor as one man being from six to eight times as efficient as another, and Mr. Welborn, in his report to which I have just referred, states that the Filipinos did the work on the government farms "as well as the Americans ever did," and at from 6 to 8 per cent of the cost. We have an abundance of evidence along the same line and to the same effect as to the efficiency of Filipino labor for ordinary work, and even in the trades and in skilled labor.

While there has been a wide range of testimony as to the wages paid over there, and it has run all the way from 10 cents a day to 30 cents a day, it matters little what it is within those limits, for I am willing to take as the basis of my argument the highest and most extravagant claim as to the present facts and the future prospects relative to labor and wages on the sugar plantations in the Philippine Islands, and from them prove my contention.

In fact, if we had never heard a word of testimony on the subject of wages in the Philippines, if we were as ignorant on the subject of wages in the beet-sugar industry of the United States as the advocates of this bill seem to be of the character and importance of that industry, I could still confidently rely for the proof of my assertions upon the general knowledge we all possess as to the difference between the labor scale of the United States and that of any tropical region on earth inhabited by a brown, a black, or a yellow race; for the wage scale is the standard of living reduced to a cash equivalent, and come what will, the wage scale of the Philippine Islands and of the United States will continue, as now, to be as wide apart as the relative standards of living, and removed from one another as far as the well-clothed, well-housed, and well-fed necessities of an American citizen of our northern latitudes are from the one-shirted, nipa-hut protected, and rice-fed opulence of a native of the Tropics.

The range of evidence with regard to the cost of sugar over there is as wide as that with regard to the cost of labor. A representative of the Agricultural Department, who was in the islands two years ago and made a most careful and painstaking examination, was given by the owners of seven large plantations on Negros, an estimate of from 62 cents to 89 cents per hundred pounds delivered at Iloilo. The average testimony up to a very recent period placed the cost at less than a dollar a hundred. Secretary Taft stated that his best information was that the average cost, laid down at the port of Iloilo for foreign shipment, was a dollar and twenty-five cents a hundred. Colonel Edwards, in the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee last winter, stated that the ocean freight to New York was 22 cents. Some have put it at 25, but Colonel Edwards ought to be right, for he cabled the governor-general for the information. Add to this nine-tenths of a cent per hundred for insurance, as per Mr. Willett, and you have a cost of Philippine sugar laid down in New York, without the duty—and of course there will be none in three years from now if this bill passes—of $1.56.

Sugar is low just now. It is nearly a cent lower a pound than it was last year, but on December 21 muscovado sugar was quoted at $3.13 per hundredweight at the port of New York. It has not gone below $2.88 this year. It has been as high as $4.75. But take the low average of $3.10 a hundred, which is much below the average for the year, and the Philippine shipper would have a profit of just about 100 per cent. The beet-sugar producer's product costs him from $3.90 to $4; the market has been ranging from $4.60 to $4.70. With these relative prices and costs, the Filipino under this bill would have a profit of 100 per cent while our own cane-sugar producer would have a profit of less than 20, and remember that his estimate of cost includes nothing for interest or wear and tear.

Even with the present duty, which averages 88 cents per hundred, on Philippine sugar, accepting Secretary Taft's estimate of cost, which makes the New York price $1.56 per hundred, add to this the duty and you have $2.44 as the price of Philippine sugar laid down in New York, duty paid, a profit, at the present price, of 66 cents a hundred, or about 28 per cent, as against the beet-sugar producer's less than 20 per cent profit.

It costs $30 an acre to plant, cultivate, and harvest an ordinary acre of sugar beets. It costs more in our western country. I do not mean in my State. We do not raise sugar beets there to any extent yet. We have no beet-sugar factories, but in the adjoining States it costs more than $30 an acre to raise sugar beets under irrigation. The average product last year was 7 tons to the acre. With a price of $5 per ton at the factory, $5 an acre is the highest profit to the farmer under the present existing conditions, on an average.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Wyoming about how many acres one hand can cultivate in the sugar-beet business. I never heard it stated.

Mr. MONDELL. I am not a sugar-beet expert and I do not know that I can offhand answer that question. They pay from $2 to $2.25 a day in the mountain region, and I do not know how many acres an ordinary field hand could cultivate. I do know this, that there is no such difference between the labor ability of any two men under the sun as is measured by the difference between a 30-cent wage and a $1.75 to $2.25 wage. There may be men who are twice as effective as other men. There may be men three times as effective as other men, but nobody who ever employed labor in the ordinary pursuits ever saw or heard of one man who could be so utterly worthless as to be only 10 per cent as good as another.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman from Wyoming permit a suggestion?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. FORDNEY. In answer to the gentleman from Kentucky, I want to say that it costs on an average about $30 per acre to raise an acre of sugar beets. Divide that by the wages to the farm hands—$1.50 or $1.75 per day—and it will tell you how many days' work it will cost to produce an acre of sugar beets.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I wanted to know how many acres one man could cultivate.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know that I can answer the gentleman's question, but, after all, from the standpoint of the gentlemen on this side, that ought not to be a very important question. It reminds me of the new method whereby we are now proposing to fix the tariff. When the revisionists next control, judging from the procedure in connection with the framing of this bill, we are to invite before the Ways and Means Committee the men representing the industries of the United States—or rather, allow them to come, if they will insist upon it—and then we are to politely invite the gentlemen interested in manufacturing and industrial pursuits across the water in competition with our people, and after we have heard their testimony we are to take as gospel truth the interested statements of gentlemen from beyond our borders as to the cost of production in their lines and laud and commend them as patriots to our people, and speak in terms of disparagement and disrespect of every man who appears before the committee representing an American industry. [Applause.] That is the new standard. Is the Republican party ready to accept it?

The gentleman from New York said he had taken upon himself his share of the "white man's burden." Let him continue to bear it and not put it on our shoulders. I would like to know and have often wondered if, instead of it being products of the farm—the only products I think of where the benefit of the tariff goes direct to the "man with the hoe"—that are threatened, there were a different situation over there, if there were mountains of iron and coking coal and all the conditions that would make iron and steel manufacturing profitable, would the gentleman from Pittsburg be as anxious for this legislation as he is to-day? [Applause.]

No danger, poor, miserable, weak brethren; the soil too poor for sugar and too rich for tobacco! Why, gentlemen, if this thing goes on, it is going to put many of us in regard to the Filipino in the attitude of mind expressed by a gentleman down at the banquet of the "Military Order of the Carabao" which I attended. He sung a song. I do not recollect all of it, and it is possible that I can not recite even the first verse correctly, but it runs something like this:

I am only a common beet-sugar man, and as for the Philippines,
They tell me I have a brown brother there who wants to beat me out of my means.
I like the word fraternity, but at this I draw the line;
He may be a brother of Secretary Taft, but he ain't no friend of mine.

[Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is growing late and I can not touch even hurriedly and briefly on many of the questions I would like to discuss in connection with this matter. I want, however, to call the attention of the House to his fact, that this is the first time in the history of the world that it has ever been proposed anywhere in any legislative body to place a bounty upon the sugar product of a tropical country of any area. In all the history of the world it has been understood among protectionists and nonprotectionists alike that there are certain products that require no protection bounty in the markets of the world, which protect themselves regardless of the price of labor employed in their production, by reason of the peculiar conditions surrounding their growth. The cotton of the south needs no protection. It might need some protection against the fellah of Egypt—and that was referred to the other day—if it were not for the fact that 5,000,000 people are living off of 5,000,000 acres, paying most of their income in taxes. Nobody has ever imagined that the corn crop of the great Mississippi Valley needed protection, it matters not what wage you pay for tilling it. It is a product peculiar to the region and can compete with all the world. The Red River Valley needs no bounty on her wheat, and by the same token it has always been understood that the growth of cane in the Tropics is an industry that can support itself against all the world.

Not so, however, with the sugar-beet industry. It is in a very large sense not a natural but an artificial industry. In its natural state the beet does not contain a sufficient amount of saccharine matter to make it worthy of consideration as a sugar producer. The increase of its saccharine constituent from 5 to 15 and 18 per cent is, perhaps, the greatest of all the triumphs of scientific agriculture, and to maintain in the beet a high percentage of saccharine matter requires persistent, unceasing, and highly intelligent effort in selection and cultivation. The extensive manufacture of sugar from this splendid product of scientific agriculture has been made possible only by wise legislation at home and abroad, which has always had for its object the protection of the industry from the fatal competition of the cane sugar of the Tropics.

As the sugar-beet industry has been the child of scientific agriculture and protecting and stimulating governmental policies, it has, by its magnificently beneficent effect and influence, richly rewarded and abundantly justified the efforts of its friends and wellwishers. It has everywhere diversified agriculture, necessitating a helpful rotation of crops, stimulating improved and intensified methods of cultivation, and by reason of the methods and practices necessary to its successful prosecution has enriched where other crops have impoverished the soil. To the tiller of the soil it has brought the blessings that follow intense cultivation; it has robbed agriculture of its loneliness; it has furnished steady and agreeable employment, and minimized the vicissitudes of agricultural pursuits by uniformity of yield and of the price of the product. At home and abroad this industry has built up and maintains thousands of thriving communities, and, unlike most agricultural industries pursued upon an extensive scale, its tendency is to multiply independent farm homes, to a subdivision of the land into small individual holdings.

In the field of trade and commerce this industry demands more transportation, utilizes a greater variety of products, calls for a greater outlay in labor, in building material, and in machinery in proportion to its value than any other agricultural product. In this country, under adequate protection, the field of its expansion is practically limitless. The forty millions of capital now invested in its manufacturing plants alone, the 250,000 tons per annum of its product can and will expand into the hundreds of millions of investment necessary to the production of the 1,800,000 tons which we are now buying of foreigners at a cost of $150,000,000 per annum. Is not an industry that accomplishes these results, that carries direct to the farms of the nation the benefit of a protective policy, whose future development presents so alluring a picture of progress and prosperity, entitled to more than passing and indifferent consideration?

It is passing strange that, in a country which affords the most marvelous object lessons that the world has ever seen of the benefits of a protective tariff, a party whose constant devotion to the protective doctrine has made that country rich and mighty, and its people prosperous above all the peoples that have ever lived beneath the skies—it is passing strange that in such a country any member of such a party should favor a measure like this; and one's wonder grows when one considers that the industry about to be wiped out is one of the very few where the farmer receives the direct benefits of the tariff.

Europe, protective and nonprotective alike, has always protected and still protects this industry. It was fed by bounty, guarded by tariff, stimulated by cartel until it grew by leaps and bounds and outstripped the cane industry. When the Brussels convention sought to put an end to overstimulation and demanded the abolition of bounties and cartels, the statesmanship of Europe recognized that the industry could not withstand free competition with tropical cane sugar.

When England and other importing countries demanded that the excessive bounties and cartels should be abolished in order that her tropical sugar-producing regions should have a fair show in the production of sugar, European nations were compelled to take off their bounty and lower their import taxes, but the Brussels convention recognized the fact that the beet-sugar industry even in Germany, with her scientific methods, Germany with her 15 to 16 per cent of average saccharine constituent, Germany with her high production per acre, Germany with her cheap labor compared with ours—even she required some protection against tropical cane sugar, and so all Europe retained upon their product a surtax of from 48 to 53 cents a hundred, generally retaining the same old consumption tax, based upon an estimate of the sugar contained in the beet below the fact, so that as a matter of fact the beet-sugar producer of Europe to-day with his industry all developed, with his fields tilled for a generation with the beet, with his labor accustomed to its production, is enjoying a protection of from 60 to 70 cents a hundred, and the great Republic of protection and the party of protection in that Republic is proposing now to place this industry, just beginning in its development, on a par with the cheapest labor of any sugar country in the world!

Java, with nothing to aid her but a chance to fight for a place in the sugar market of the world, increased her output 500,000 tons in ten years, and she did it on the lowest sugar market the world ever knew, produced by the bounty-fed beet sugars of Europe. Cuba, devastated by war, with 88 per cent of her factories in ruins, and with her plantations grown up to grass, increased her output a million round tons in five years, and who shall say that these islands, which we have always claimed were rich and fair and fertile beyond those of any other isles in the eastern seas, can not under this hitherto unheard of stimulus increase their output by leaps and bounds? Why, think of it! They say themselves it only costs them $1.25 a hundred pounds to lay it down at Iloilo. Three years ago they said it cost them 60 to 80 cents a hundred, and we are proposing to give them a bounty of $1.20 a hundred. We are going to take from the pockets of American citizens a tariff duty equal to $1.20 for every hundred pounds of sugar they send us. Stimulate the industry! If the islands are not too poor and miserable to make it worth while to take up the time of the American Congress in the discussion of them, under that stimulus there is no reason under heaven why their output should not increase more rapidly than Cuba's did under a bounty of one-fifth the amount.

The beet-sugar grower in my country or in the West or anywhere you will find lives on a little farm—a small farm. He owns it himself. He has his little home. The cane-sugar grower the world over has a hacienda and peon or semipeon labor. Go to the sugar plantations of Hawaii, if you will, and you will find their labor is as well cared for or better cared for than any tropical cane sugar labor on the face of the earth, and see the crowded hovels in which the Japanese congregate who till those fields; and we are going to make it impossible to multiply the little farm in the West to build up imperial states over there beyond the seas! The beet-sugar industry is one of those few agricultural industries carried on on a large scale where the tendency is to a division of the land into small areas—the ideal condition. Out in our region if a settler desires to go into the business under the reclamation law of the Government he can homestead from 40 to 160 acres of land. He must make it his home, and he pays the Government the cost of reclamation—from $30 to $55—after which he must grub, clear, and level it and make his laterals.

No such limitation, no such condition, no such expenditures hamper the man who, under the provisions of this bill, is going to build up the sugar haciendas of the Philippines.

A simple article of incorporation is the open door to the purchase of twenty-five hundred and sixty acres of land at from $2 an acre upward; to the lease of an additional twenty-five hundred acres of land adjoining it at a rental of 10 cents an acre and upward for twenty-five years and a renewal for twenty-years more, and yet these princely estates of 5,000 acres are five times too small, according to Secretary Taft, to build up this industry, which is going to take the industry away from the Michigan and the Colorado farmer.

Gentlemen, remember the beet-sugar industry is in its infancy. In that respect it has no advantage over the industry over there. They are both comparatively small, but open the door, give the cheap labor of this wonderfully rich land the same market that you give the American sugar producer and does anyone imagine that any more sugar factories will be built here? Aye, we have an object lesson of what will occur in the fact that even the reduction of 20 per cent in favor of Cuba almost put an end to the further extension of the industry. And what an industry it is! None in the whole domain of agriculture is more helpful. It is twice blessed in that it produces a sure, a certain, and fairly remunerative income and enriches the land instead of impoverishing it.

The industry requires more transportation, more machinery, more material per dollar of the product than any on earth. The $40,000,000 invested in the fifty-three beet-sugar factories in these United States represent at least $30,000,000 of machinery and material bought of American manufacturers, at least that much, and with the splendid opportunities before American industry and capital there is no reason why, if this bill does not pass, $200,000,000 of capital should not be invested in this industry in the next twenty years.

The gentlemen who propose this legislation have tried to quiet the beet-sugar producers by insisting that in any event they can not be injured; they say the country buys so much sugar from foreign countries at full tariff rates, that in no event can their industry suffer. That is what they said to us when the Cuban bill passed, but the fact is that with the increase of production in Cuba, Hawaii, and Porto Rico, and the increase of beet and cane sugar production at home, we will receive this year under this bill, which would give us all the Philippine product, barring a possible increase in consumption, within 187,000 tons—and not 800,000 tons, as gentlemen told us the other day—of a condition where every pound of sugar coming into the United States comes in under a reduced duty; and if we secure no more than the present production of the Philippines, within twelve months the beet-sugar industry of the country must face a reduction of 20 per cent on its product, the delayed effect of Cuban reciprocity, which will come when all sugars we import are coming in at a 20 per cent reduction.

We are facing that right now, and the man asked to invest in beet-sugar factories will, if this bill passes, be facing that other day when the sugar of those tropical islands, rich and fertile, fed with a bounty equal to the cost of production, will pour in here in a never-ending stream. I will put in the RECORD a statement of the amount of sugar we are likely to receive this year compared with our consumption.

Sugar consumption in the United States and sources of supply.

In my hurry, Mr. Chairman, I have passed over a number of matters I should like to discuss, but I must pass on. Gentlemen have talked a good deal about plain duty; they have said we must do this thing because the Philippine Islands are part of these United States. I can not understand how anyone who supports this bill can take any such position. You are not treating the Filipinos in this measure on an equality with the American citizen. You are giving them all the benefits of our splendid market; you are compelling our people to pay an internal-revenue tax on their products; you are giving them the revenues collected in the islands.

The proponents of this bill say, "Why not treat them as we treat Alaska or as we treat Arizona?" Aye, if that was done, then gentlemen could consistently support the measure. But they do not do it. They do not propose to do it. They do not dare to do it. And if it is right to pass a bill that gives all the benefits of the American market to these people and does not place the obligations of American citizens upon them, it is certainly right and proper and just, and it is our duty, to levy such import tax as shall measure the difference in the cost of production of a natural product of the Philippine Islands, and of a product of our farms and factories—one which brings unnumbered blessings in its train.

But there is one sledge-hammer proposition—a sockdolager—which has been fired at us from every quarter as the final argument which fixes, defines, and certifies our duty. Shall we be less fair to these poor people than was tyrannical Spain? Did she not give them the advantage in her markets? We have that from Secretary Taft. We have had it from Colonel Edwards. We have had it from the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], and we have had it from the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], and possibly from the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], who favors this measure.

The latter does not favor it, I think, because it does not affect the tariff on Missouri mules or Missouri zinc or lead, but he does favor it. They said that we must do as well by the Philippines as Spain did. Why, I wonder if the gentlemen have never discovered what the facts are with regard to that wonderful market that Spain gave the Philippines. There are more tons of sugar to-day, Mr. Chairman, in the bonded warehouses of the United States, hoping to come in when this legislation shall pass, at a reduced duty of half a million dollars, than Spain received from the Philippines in ten years. The highest importation in any year of the last twenty before we took the islands into the Spanish peninsula from the Philippines was 10,000 tons, not the product of one good-sized plantation. Why? Because while she gave the Philippines a preferential entrance into her market, she still maintained against her a tax high enough to protect good and plenty the Spanish beet and cane sugar grower.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. And taxed everything they did locally.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentlemen have simply been misled by one of those delightful operations of legislative legerdemain dear to the Spanish heart, whereby they fed the imagination of their colonists while they robbed them of their substance.

"But," said one of the distinguished gentlemen who appeared in an official capacity before the committee, "it is not the American market we are seeking by this legislation. We will not ship much sugar to the United States, even with this reduction of tariff. We simply want to use the opportunity of the free market of the United States as a club to compel the Chinese merchants to pay us as much for our sugar for consumption in China and Japan as we could get in the United States." Has so absurd a proposition ever been heard before outside of an institution for the feeble-minded? And yet it was gravely urged before a great committee of this House that the reduction of our duty on Philippine sugars would raise the world price in all of the oriental markets by the amount of our reduction, and thus keep the Philippine sugar on the other side of the world. I should not refer to so utterly and ridiculously absurd an argument if it were not for the fact that the gentleman who made it was put forward by the proponents of this bill and paraded before the committee to display his fantastic theories as an important part of the highly variegated, largely imaginative, and altogether illogical display of arguments in behalf of the measure.

I am reminded, Mr. Chairman, that all of those who urged this legislation before the committee have talked from a Philippine standpoint—governmental or personal. Secretary Taft does not claim to know the condition of the American beet-sugar industry. He would not say he would not be in favor of this legislation if it would destroy the industry. He said that he spoke from the standpoint of the Filipino.

Now, it is possible that something needs to be done over there. The gentlemen who appeared before the committee, as I read their testimony, suggested all sorts of remedies except this. So far as I recall, nobody except the officials of the Filipino government and the politicians of the islands, most of them ex-insurrectos, urged the reduction of the tariff duty. The men who seemed to speak for the Filipino people, as I read those hearings, asked for other things. They asked that the vexatious, ridiculous restrictions on the use of timber from the public domain be removed—restrictions under which they say it costs twice as much to build a plantation as it did in the olden days.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman be given time in which to finish his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks that the gentleman from Wyoming be given time in which to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. A country of 12 feet annual rainfall, where timber grows rapidly, with 40,000,000 acres of timber; a people whom they tell us are barbaric, half civilized, speaking many different languages; and yet they have, according to this circular which I hold, enough red tape enveloping the use of timber on the public lands to puzzle the legendary Philadelphia lawyer, and they charge so much for the timber that between charges and vexatious regulations it costs twice as much as formerly.

Remove the restriction on the use of timber in that country, where it grows so rapidly that you can not cut it fast enough to keep pace with the increased growth. They want better roads. Take some of the millions we are turning into their treasury and build better roads. If the sugar industry requires nursing, nurse it with the tariff taxes collected here on their products and returned to them. They are suffering from usurers. Must we then break down the protective policy of the United States; must we go back on the history of a great party because the people in a few islands of the Philippines require protection from usurers? Give them banks if necessary. They want better transportation facilities. Start those railroads we have been hearing so much about.

The gentlemen on the other side say that they are opposed to high protective tariff, and yet if they vote for this bill they are extending the domain and effect of the protective tariff. They want to break down the tariff wall, they say, to take tariff burdens off the people, and yet in their minority report they insist this will not lower the price of the products affected, and therefore, according to their view, will not bring relief to any American citizen, while it threatens an American industry. If support of this measure is illogical from the standpoint of a protectionist, how much more illogical is this misfit legislation, giving the markets of the United States to the Filipino people and adding burdens on our own people, threatening American industries, and not relieving a soul on earth of any dollar of direct or indirect taxation, from any possible standpoint of a free trader.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, I hope the bill will not pass. I hope that ere it reaches the final stage, even if it should pass this body, the final stage leading to its enactment, that wiser counsels will prevail. I hope that in our own party the quickened conscience of the protection sentiment will shame the petty, miserable arguments of expediency that are pressing this measure to its passage.

I hope that this menace to an American industry will be thrust aside. I hope the Philippine people will be spared this thing that eventually can bring them nothing but ruin and disaster. For after you build up there with German and English machinery and foreign and American capital princely haciendas with their peon labor, the enterprises carried on with all the extravagances that this unheard-of bounty is sure to produce, the time will come when the legend, "Killed by the Republican party," having been writ on the walls of the beet-sugar factories of the United States, the American people will awaken to the fact that we are paying $1.95 more than the world's price for sugar, and that no American within our continental possessions is profiting a penny thereby. [Applause.] And when that day comes the tariff will be repealed. Then these men, unable to compete with Java, because they have had a bounty of 100 per cent over her; unable to compete with Cuba, because of their hot-house fed industry; unable to compete with any other tropical country on even terms, the money wrung from American taxpayers spent in riotous living by the owners of these haciendas in the capitals of Europe, their estates will be closed up, abandoned, and their last end will be infinitely worse than their first; but in the meantime our industry will be destroyed.

We passed here a couple of years ago a bill which some of us labored earnestly for, under which we are irrigating arid lands in the western country, charging the settler on these lands every dollar of expenditure by the Government, and amounting from twenty-five to fifty-five dollars an acre for ungrubbed, unleveled land. Some of the lands are peculiarly adapted to sugar beets. After the beet-sugar industry is destroyed by this legislation one of the principal means of paying the Government for these lands will be gone.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Do I understand the gentleman from Wyoming to assert that it is his opinion that the retention of the Philippine Islands under the present policy will work destruction to the beet-sugar industry of the United States proper?

Mr. MONDELL. I have not spoken to much effect if I have not conveyed that idea, and I will try and state it explicitly and clearly. It is my opinion from a study of the subject that runs back a number of years that the beet-sugar industry can not exist anywhere on earth in competition with tropically grown cane sugar, and I think the only question involved is whether or no the Philippine Islands can produce and will produce any considerable quantity of sugar. That they will produce it under this tremendous stimulus there can be no doubt, if they are worth their salt. If they are not, why are we threatening American industries in attempting to do what some gentlemen say is impossible?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I should like to ask the gentleman another question: If his position be correct, does not the choice come to us then of letting the Philippines go or letting our beet-sugar industry go?

Mr. MONDELL. Why, I think not. I think so far as gentlemen on this side are concerned—I do not know how the gentleman himself feels about it—that question was settled long ago. The Supreme Court of the United States decided that we have the power to pass special tariff laws applicable to these islands. That is what the decision amounted to. And on this side it is party policy that we not only have the right, aye, but that it is just and equitable and proper both to the people of those islands and to our own people to fix such tariffs between us as shall measure the difference in cost of production of similar products.

Are we come to this on both sides of the House? Are we finally so lacking in ability for constructive legislation that we can not go into this subject with a clear and unbiased mind and fix the difference in that cost? I think it has been fixed now in favor of the Filipino. He is getting a better price in proportion in the markets of New York to-day than the beet-sugar producer is; and if this bill passes he will get a hundred per cent profit where the beet-sugar producer, on the present market, gets a profit of 19 per cent. Under present conditions, paying 88 cents average duty, his profit, on his own statement—his own exaggerated statement of cost—is 21 per cent in our markets, as compared with the 19 per cent profit of the beet-sugar producers.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I should like to make this further suggestion to the gentleman from Wyoming: I believe, upon constitutional grounds, that we ought to have absolute free trade between the Philippine Islands and this country. I believe they constitute a part of this country, and I do not believe that we have any right to impose a tariff against them. Of course I understand that gentlemen on that side of the House take a different view; yet the leaders on that side take the position now that from the moral standpoint we owe it to the Filipinos to have free trade with them.

Now, in its practical result it does not make any difference whether they favor free trade from the constitutional standpoint or from the moral standpoint. If they stand for free trade, as I do, with the Philippine Islands, the result must necessarily be the same to the beet-sugar industry or the people in the Northwest. So, as I said before, you are confronted with this position, that you must either see the destruction of the beet industry or you must let go of the Philippine Islands. Now, it does not answer that, in my opinion, to say, as the gentleman has said, that it has been determined to hold onto the Philippine Islands. I take it that if it develops in the subsequent history of our relation with the Philippine Islands that they are absolutely destroying the people of the continental United States, we will let go of them. We are not bound to hold onto them if they are absolutely destroying the industries of the United States.

Mr. MONDELL. I will say, in answer to the gentleman, that I am not in a position to give an opinion that is worth while as to how long we will hold the Philippine Islands. I have stated that, so far as our party is concerned, we have already taken the stand that it is legal and proper and right to fix tariffs between the mainland and tropical possessions, if I may use that term. But taking the position the gentleman does, I am at a loss to know how he can support this legislation on the alleged ground of plain duty. If it is our plain duty to give these people our market, it is our plain duty to make them assume all the responsibilities and burdens of American citizenship. [Applause.] And if gentlemen will take that stand then, at least, they will be consistent. But voting for a measure that gives them the benefits of our splendid markets, built up by protection, as we on this side believe, and still leave them free to tax American citizens for their alcohol imported here, for the cigars imported here, free to collect taxes that belong to the United States, that should go into the United States Treasury, and use them for their own purposes; free to so arrange their tariff on agricultural and sugar-manufacturing machinery that our manufacturers have no advantage in their markets while they have a hundred per cent advantage in ours, if there is any justice or equity in that proposition, I confess that I am too dense to see it.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I think there is just about as much justice in that proposition as there is in the proposition to tax the people of Kentucky to maintain manufacturing institutions in the New England States. I think it is just about on a par. I do not believe in any of it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am against the protective tariff, and if I can not get rid of protection in the tariff schedule altogether, I will get rid of as much of it as I can. That is why I shall vote for this proposition.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman admits that it is inconsistent, that it is inequitable, but he is going to vote for it on the theory—and it is a good enough excuse on that side of the House—that it is going to make trouble. The minority state at the beginning of the minority report that they hail with satisfaction the disaffection that now appears when we are proposing to bring the products of an underpaid tropical labor in competition with American labor.

Mr. Chairman, I have already taken the time of the House longer than I should, and I wish to thank gentlemen for their attention, and I beg everyone, on this side of the House at least, to seriously consider the effect of this legislation, what it means to that great principle that is one of foundation stones of our party policy, this party—that has stood through good report and ill, through storms and fair weather for protection; that has declared that protection is not a local question, that it is a question nation wide; that under the beneficent wing of the Republican protective tariff policy every American product and every American industry shall receive fair treatment and equal justice—can not afford to do this thing.

The gentleman from New York is going to unload his portion of the white man's burden onto the sugar producer, the tobacco producer, and the rice producer of these United States. I do not believe it will be done; it is too directly in contradiction of everything that has been said and everything that has been done on this side in all the years since the Philippines came to us.

As I said, wiser counsel will prevail. The splendid industries of a free people, the industries that build up homes, the industries that make and maintain American citizenship, these will be protected. We will do justice by the Filipino; we will not curse him with our misguided sentimentality, but will remember, as De la Rama said to the gentleman from New York—and I commend that statement to him as he commended it to you; not the half-civilized De la Rama, as the gentleman suggested, but the highly civilized, French educated De la Rama, the absentee landlord of many a glorious sugar hacienda with the carabao mill and the old iron kettles, who, very properly speaking for himself and his industry, begging for a bounty great as the cost of his product, even he, in the moment when he had some hope that this would be accomplished, could not fail but recognize the fact—"that charity begins at home." I hope this House will remember it. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Chairman, the bill now under consideration has been reported to the House by the Committee on Ways and Means because it is believed to be in the interest of the people of the Philippine Islands. The report submitted by the majority of the committee says that they are the wards of the nation; that their relations do not differ from that of the people of Porto Rico:

To teach them the lesson of industry we must furnish opportunity. The free interchange of commodities among all the people under the American flag is one of the fundamental principles of our Government. It is as much our plain duty to grant free trade to the people of the Philippines as it ever was to the people of Porto Rico. There is no excuse to continue our tariff against them except for the purpose of revenue.

The members of the minority of the committee offer a substitute, but say in this report that if such substitute is voted down they will support the bill of the majority. So it is safe to assume that tariff legislation in the interest of the Filipinos will be enacted during the present session of Congress.

While there is perhaps an increasing number of our citizens who wish that Dewey had sailed away from the islands after the battle of Manila Bay, it is very generally recognized, I think, that we shall retain them for at least a generation—it may be many—until the people are prepared for self-government. In the meantime it is but common justice that we should give them every reasonable opportunity for development and prosperity.

Now that the Committee on Ways and Means has heard and favorably considered the prayer of the wards of the nation, I trust it will not be considered treasonable for a Republican to suggest to that committee that it give some consideration to the appeal of the citizens here at home for relief from oppressive tariff schedules. For some time they have been asking for free hides and free coal and free iron ore and free lumber. They have begged for free alcohol in the arts and for a reduction of some of the duties fixed in 1897 and now believed to be too high. They would like to have the Committee on Ways and Means make a thorough investigation to determine if changes in existing tariff rates are not now demanded by changed conditions. The Republican party has said that the tariff would be revised by its friends when demanded by changed conditions. I believe that tariff revision and readjustment should be undertaken now, and that is the expressed opinion of the Republicans of my State.

At the Republican State convention held in Boston on October 6, 1905, the committee on resolutions submitted a platform which included a resolution favoring an immediate consideration of the tariff for the purpose of revision and readjustment. That tariff plank occasioned spirited discussion in the convention and has been the subject of varied comment ever since. It goes without saying that in a matter of this kind it is impossible to satisfy everyone. The committee on resolutions of the Massachusetts Republican State convention clearly realizing that fact did not attempt a feat so unwise, imprudent, and impossible. This much, however, was accomplished: The platform was satisfactory to all but one of the nineteen members of the committee on resolutions, and it was adopted by the convention by a vote which was almost unanimous. Although there was some opposition to the resolution, no one ventured to test the sentiment of the convention by offering an amendment—a fact which speaks volumes. It was clear that the views of an overwhelming majority of the Republicans of Massachusetts had been satisfactorily expressed. I feel that I have a right, therefore, to ask my party associates in Congress to give to that deliberate and carefully considered expression of opinion their honest and favorable attention.

The resolution to which I ask your consideration reads as follows:

We believe that the policy of protection to American labor and American industry should be maintained. The Republican party of Massachusetts reaffirms its devotion to the principle of protection, and is opposed to tariff changes tending to depress or destroy any of our industries or to lower the wages of American labor. But we recognize the fact, as declared by the national Republican convention at Chicago, that rates should be changed when conditions have so changed that the public interest demands the alteration of schedules. The time at which revision of the tariff should be undertaken must be determined by the representatives of the party from all parts of our common country. We approve the position taken by our Senators and Representatives at the last session of Congress in favor of present action, and we urge that they should continue to press upon their party associates in Congress from other States the wisdom of a consideration of the tariff for the purpose of revision and readjustment.

By this resolution Massachusetts Republicans reaffirmed their devotion to the principle of protection and expressed their opposition to tariff changes tending to depress or destroy any of our industries or to lower the wages of American labor. Surely any who desire changes which would wreck our industries or lower wages have no standing in a Republican convention or in the Republican party. Republicans are protectionists. No matter how much they may differ as to the necessity for changes in tariff schedules, they all believe that the policy of protection should be maintained. The history of our country justifies our adherence to that policy. The story of our wonderful progress under Republican administration is a familiar one. You know of the great increase in our national wealth. You do not need to be reminded of the amazing growth of our exports. Last year our exports were $1,491,744,695, the largest in our history. We have become the greatest manufacturing nation in the world, and last year our exports of manufactured goods were nearly $100,000,000 more than in the previous year. More than 5,000,000 people are engaged in this branch of industry. The lamented Secretary Hay told us a year ago that the value of manufactured goods was thirteen times as much as it was when the Republicans met at Jackson in 1854.

Republican conventions everywhere call attention, as well they may, to the magnificent results of protection from the beginning of the Government to the present time, and contrast them with the disaster which has resulted from the opposite policy whenever it has been put in practice. The Democratic party at its national convention in 1904 declared that it favored "a gradual reduction of the tariff," but influential members of that party (members of the House Committee on Ways and Means), who would be very active and influential in framing a new tariff bill in the event of Democratic success, have said on the floor of the House that protection was robbery, and that if they could have their way they would tear down every custom-house, "from turret to foundation stone," and that we must never lose sight of the ultimate goal—free trade. It is not strange that the American people at the last Presidential election declined in no uncertain way to follow leadership which would change the policy under which we have grown so strong. And the Republicans of Massachusetts very naturally reaffirmed their devotion to the principle of protection.

But they also recognized the fact, as declared by the national Republican convention at Chicago, that rates should be changed when conditions have so changed that the public interest demands the alteration of schedules. They also recognized the fact that the time at which revision of the tariff should be undertaken must be determined by the representatives of the party from all parts of our common country. The Republicans of Massachusetts do not ask their representatives to attempt to bring about tariff revision by making an alliance with representatives of the Democratic party, who do not agree with them as to the necessity of maintaining the protective principle. They wish tariff revision, but they recognize that it should come by the action of the representatives of their own party from all parts of our country.

Having recognized the facts that changes should be made in tariff schedules when the public interest demands them, and that the time for such changes must be determined by the representatives of their own party, the delegates at our convention approved the position taken by their Senators and Representatives in favor of present action and urged that they should continue to press upon their party associates in Congress from other States the wisdom of a consideration of the tariff for the purpose of revision and readjustment. I know that this declaration has been denounced by Democrats and by certain high priests of the stand-patters, who are perhaps moved by fear that some pet schedule may be jarred by revision, as a "straddle," but I respectfully submit that those who so characterize it must be perverse to the verge of hopelessness.

It is still true that there are none so blind as those who won't see or who do not want to see. Present action does not mean past action or future action. It means now—that now is the accepted time. The Republicans of Massachusetts have thus in most positive terms placed themselves on record as favoring an immediate revision and adjustment of tariff schedules.

The Republican party is not, never has been, and I trust never will become a "stand-pat" party. Its motto is not and never has been "Let well enough alone." It could not have accomplished its great work for our country and for humanity if it had been animated by any such milk-and-water sentiment as that. It does not stand pat. It is not content with the work it has already accomplished, but faces the future. New problems are now pressing for solution—problems which must be solved aright if the welfare of our country is to be secure—and the Republican party should be ready and eager to attest to the work now awaiting it.

Henry L. Dawes, who represented Massachusetts in the House and the Senate for thirty-six consecutive years, and whose splendid devotion to the cause of protection can never be forgotten, has said:

It is a mistake to suppose that tariff legislation is a fixed science. There can be no tariff formulated that can last while all conditions on which it is based are changing.

I hold it to be the duty of a party responsible for a tariff law to see to it that when a duty is no longer needed for the protection of our industries, it be removed; when it has become so high as to be a bounty and thus an unnecessary tax upon the consumer, it be reduced. Protection is based upon the difference in the cost of production abroad and at home. No one should ask for more.

The Dingley law was enacted more than eight years ago. I have never heard anyone claim that it was perfect, even at the time of its enactment. Concessions had to be made. It was necessarily a compromise. In many particulars it was not, when finally enacted, as Mr. Dingley desired it to be. It was the best that could be done under all the circumstances, and has proved a wonderfully efficient law. It would, however, be amazing indeed if during the past eight years there had not been changes in conditions which call for some modification of our tariff schedules by way of revision and adjustment. It is not like the Republican party to shrink from an honest and thorough consideration of a subject because such consideration may be surrounded by difficulties. It is responsible for the the Dingley law, and is therefore responsible for any injustice which exists by reason of it. There should be no desire to escape from that conclusion. We have a large majority in the Senate and House of Representatives. Having the power, we should not hestitate to use it. Let us give to this subject honest and fearless consideration. When such consideration discloses the fact that a duty is no longer needed, let us remove it. This is simple justice. It will benefit all the people, and will, I believe, be responsive to the commercial needs of the country.

It was suggested at our State convention that a specific demand be made that hides, coal, iron ore, lumber, and wood pulp be placed on the free list. Personally, it seemed to me then, and it seems to me now, that there are sound reasons for urging that these articles be placed on the free list. That is certainly so with respect to hides, coal, and iron ore. In November a delegation of boot and shoe and leather manufacturers called on President Roosevelt and urged upon him the necessity of a repeal of the duty on hides. The delegation numbered twenty-eight men, representing a majority of the leather, tanning, and boot and shoe industries of the United States, and a majority of them came from New York and the West. They claimed to speak for the manufacturers of $300,000,000 worth of shoes, that they employed over 100,000 workmen, and pay about $75,000,000 to wage-earners. They said that they were unanimous in asking for the repeal of the duty on hides, that this great industry is oppressed and burdened by a needless duty which prevents proper growth and expansion, both domestic and foreign. Attention was called to the fact that the cost of leather in the cheap, heavy shoes worn by the greatest number of our people is proportionately greater than in expensive and highly finished shoes. And so the spokesman for the delegation claimed that they were pleading not alone for those engaged in manufacturing, but also for the welfare of the people who wear shoes. About 240,000,000 pairs of shoes are made annually in the United States, and the difference in the price of leather here and where there is no duty on hides varies from 3 to 5 cents per pound, which means from 4 to 7 cents on the average factory cost. The price of hides has risen from 9 cents in 1897 to 15½ cents in 1905. As cattle are raised and slaughtered principally for beef, hides are a by-product, and it is doubtful if cattle raisers gain any benefit from the duty, as prices fluctuate, so far as the trust permits, in accord with the supply and demand for cattle for beef purposes.

It has been often insinuated that the manufacturers who were crying so loudly for the removal of the duty on hides were actuated solely by selfish purposes; that while they wished no duty on hides they would fight vigorously against any reduction of the duty on their manufactured product. The gentlemen who appeared before the President denied this and stated that they would willingly consent to a reasonable reduction of this duty.

Ex-Governor Douglas (a Democrat and one of the largest manufacturers of shoes in the world) closed his remarks by saying:

The duty on hides permits a charge of 15 per cent more for hides here than in foreign markets. In the boot and shoe industry we pay the highest wages on earth, but we have the cheapest labor, where efficiency and product are considered. Neither we manufacturers nor our employees are protected to any considerable extent by the duty of 25 per cent on boots and shoes. All we ask is a fair field and no favor, either in our own or in foreign markets. Take away the duties that prevent us from obtaining leather at the same prices paid by our foreign competitors and we will not only hold our own markets, with or without a duty on shoes, but we will invade foreign markets on an extensive scale. In so doing we will provide additional work at good wages to our boot and shoe workers. While the duty on hides bears heavily on our industry in every part of the country, now that Germany, Canada, and Mexico are discriminating against our shoes and are levying, or threatening to levy, much higher duties upon them, it will be even more difficult for us to hold our share of this industry, handicapped as we are. Unless the cost of materials can be reduced shoes must soon sell at higher prices.

Hon. Curtis Guild, jr., a Republican, who has just been elected governor of Massachusetts, supplemented the efforts of the delegation of manufacturers by a letter to the President, in which he said:

Here in Massachusetts the duty on hides is anathema. It is known that only 23 per cent of the hides and skins that come into the United States are subject to duty, and it seems perfectly illogical that calfskins, sheepskins, and goatskins should come in free as a by-product while a duty is assessed on the skins of full-grown cattle. There can be no question of the desire of the overwhelming majority of the people of this State for attention to such matters as this in the immediate revision of the tariff.

I know it is feared by some, probably many, that any serious consideration of tariff changes will bring demoralization to business. Many so-called "standpatters" freely admit that there are glaring errors in our present tariff law which demand attention. They say that they would favor correcting such errors if it could be done without a general tariff revision, but they argue that the country is now prosperous and that nothing ought to be done which might disturb present business conditions. I can not share that fear if action is taken by the friends of protection, by those absolutely pledged to maintain the principle of protection. If such changes made to right admitted wrongs can not be brought about without placing in peril our prosperity, then it seems to me such prosperity must be conceded to rest upon very unstable foundation and to be a growth of the mushroom variety.

History has a habit of repeating itself, and there is certainly reason to fear that if changes demanded in the interest of the people are not made the task of revision will be handed over to those who are opposed to the principle of protection and bent upon its destruction. We had that kind of revision not many years ago, and the humiliation and suffering which followed have not been forgotten. In four years the value of Massachusetts manufactures alone declined over $146,000,000, and the bank clearings of Boston fell off over four hundred millions in one year.

Tariff revision by the Democratic party meant mills running on short time or not at all and reduced wages. Remarkable business activity followed the passage of the Dingley bill. The people do not wish another Wilson-Gorman tariff. They have shown again and again by their votes that they distrust the party which was responsible for that bill.

Our orators have proclaimed that the tariff should be revised by its friends. We now have a large majority in the House and in the Senate. Having so large a majority, I hardly think we should admit our impotence to remedy any injustice for which we are responsible. If we deliberately close the door not only to action but to thorough investigation, we have none to blame but ourselves for the withdrawal of confidence which will surely follow. I can not believe the Republican party will shirk what seems so plain a duty.

And so our Republicans of Massachusetts have called for immediate action. They are protectionists and propose to remain such, but they do not believe in the sacredness of any tariff schedule. They have urged their Representatives to ask the cooperation of their party associates because they know that it is of the utmost importance that such action should be taken not by tariff wreckers, by those who would tear down our custom-houses, but by those who have always been true to the principle of protection.

The Committee on Ways and Means has heeded the prayer of the Filipinos. Will it not now give some attention to the petitions of our home folks? [Loud applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I move the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr, OLMSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 3—the Philippine tariff bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. MORGAN. I introduce a bill which I ask may be read at length and that it may lie on the table until to-morrow, when I will submit some remarks on it.

The bill (S. 2828) to provide for the regulation, by judicial authority, of the freight rates of railroad companies and other common carriers, and the preferential advantages granted by such common carriers to certain persons and places, to the wrong and injury of others, was read the first time by its title.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to have the bill read at length for the information of the Senate, but I will not take up the time of the Senate if I can have permission to have the bill printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be printed in full in the RECORD.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all railroad corporations or companies and all other corporations, companies, and persons engaged as common carriers in transporting, by land or water, freight or passengers among or between the States, or in or through the District of Columbia, are prohibited from demanding or receiving more than a reasonable compensation for such service, on their respective lines of transportation, or any part thereof on which they are so engaged, directly, or by agreement with any other corporation, company, or person; and they are likewise prohibited from giving unreasonable preferences in rates or charges for transportation services, or in the facilities of transportation, to any shipper or passenger, to or between any place or places on such routes or lines of transportation, to other shippers or passengers.

SEC. 2. The shipper or owner of any property, or any passenger on lines or routes of transportation, such as are mentioned or described in section 1 of this act, may sue such common carrier in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the parties to the suit, for the recovery of such unreasonable charges for transportation, or for any damages sustained by the plaintiff in the suit, by reason of the giving unreasonable preferences in rates or facilities of transportation that are prohibited in the first section of this act; and in any suit brought under or in accordance with the provisions of said section the court shall entertain jurisdiction, without respect to the sum sought to be recovered therein, provided, the sum claimed by the plaintiff in the action shall be $50 or more.

SEC. 3. Appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States may be granted, or writs of error may issue from the Supreme Court of the United States for the review of a final judgment in any suit authorized in sections 1 and 2 of this act, on the application of any of the parties litigant, without reference to the amount of the judgment therein, rendered in a district court of the United States, and in such cases the district courts and the Supreme Court of the United States shall advance the same for trial or hearing over other civil causes on their dockets if, in the opinion of the court, the public interests are not injuriously affected by such order.

SEC. 4. If the plaintiff in a suit in the district court of the United States, instituted under or in accordance with this act, shall obtain judgment for a sum less than $50, the costs of such suit may be taxed equally between the parties, plaintiff, and defendant therein. If the recovery in such suit by the plaintiff shall be as much or a sum greater than $50, the entire costs shall be taxed against the defendant therein.

SEC. 5. Any citizen of a State may make complaint to the governor thereof, setting forth the facts which show a breach of the provisions of this act by any common carrier engaged in the business of transportation described in the first section thereof, and thereupon such governor, if he determines that it is proper and expedient for the people of the State that suit should be instituted, and is empowered by the laws of such State to institute suit for the determination of the questions and matters mentioned in the first section of this act, is hereby authorized institute and prosecute a suit against any of the common carriers referred to in this act, in the name of the State of which he is governor, in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, for the recovery of any such demand or for the recovery of any damages that such citizen may be entitled to recover or that the people of such State or of any defined locality in such State have suffered through the unlawful conduct of such common carrier. Such sums as may be recovered in such suits in the name of the State are to be at the disposal of the legislature of such State. The State instituting such suit shall be regarded in all respects as the plaintiff in the action: Provided, That such a suit shall not be brought in any State in a district court of the United States for any judicial district of the United States within such State; but such suit in a district court of the United States may be instituted in any other State or district of which the defendants are citizens or in which any of them are liable to be sued in the district or any other courts of the United States.

SEC. 6. The service of process upon any director or officer of a corporation or company mentioned in the first section of this act at any place in which he is liable to be sued in any court of the United States shall be sufficient service as to such corporation or company and as to all the members thereof to compel their appearance, to abide by and perform its orders and the final judgment of the court when rendered.

SEC. 7. Nothing in this act contained shall be construed as depriving any person who sues in his own right and name from instituting any suit under its provisions or any other suit, at law or in equity, in any State court or in any court of the United States against any common carrier.

SEC. 8. In all suits instituted under the provisions of this act or in accordance therewith against common carriers in the district courts of the United States the question of the reasonableness of rates or compensation demanded by or paid to a common carrier for the transportation of freights or passengers and the question of the reasonableness of any preference given by a common carrier to shippers of freights or of passengers over other shippers or passengers or to any place over any other place shall be considered as mixed questions of law and fact, to be determined and decided by a court and jury.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will lie on the table until to-morrow.

REPORT OF ISTHMIAN CANAL COMMISSION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I inclose herewith the annual report of the Isthmian Canal Commission, the annual report of the Panama Railroad Company, and the Secretary of War's letter transmitting the same, together with certain papers.

The work on the Isthmus is being admirably done, and great progress has been made, especially during the last nine months. The plant is being made ready and the organization perfected. The first work to be done was the work of sanitation, the necessary preliminary to the work of actual construction; and this has been pushed forward with the utmost energy and means. In a short while I shall lay before you the recommendations of the Commission and of the board of consulting engineers as to the proper plan to be adopted for the canal itself, together with my own recommendations thereon. All the work so far has been done not only with the utmost expedition but in the most careful and thorough manner; and what has been accomplished gives us good reason to believe that the canal will be dug in a shorter time than had been anticipated and at an expenditure within the estimated amount. All our citizens have a right to congratulate themselves upon the high standard of efficiency and integrity which has been hitherto maintained by the representatives of the Government in doing this great work. If this high standard of efficiency and integrity can be maintained in the future at the same level which it has now reached, the construction of the Panama Canal will be one of the feats to which the people of this Republic will look back with the highest pride.

From time to time various publications have been made, and from time to time in the future various similar publications doubtless will be made, purporting to give an account of jobbery, or immorality, or inefficiency, or misery, as obtaining on the Isthmus. I have carefully examined into each of these accusations which seemed worthy of attention. In every instance the accusations have proved to be without foundation in any shape or form. They spring from several sources. Sometimes they take the shape of statements by irresponsible investigators of a sensational habit of mind incapable of observing or repeating with accuracy what they see and desirous of obtaining notoriety by widespread slander. More often they originate with or are given currency by individuals with a personal grievance. The sensation mongers, both those who stay at home and those who visit the Isthmus, may ground their accusations on false statements by some engineer, who, having applied for service on the Commission and been refused such service, now endeavors to discredit his successful competitors; or by some lessee or owner of real estate who has sought action or inaction by the Commission to increase the value of his lots and is bitter because the Commission can not be used for such purposes; or on the tales of disappointed bidders for contracts; or of officeholders who have proved incompetent or who have been suspected of corruption and dismissed or who have been overcome by panic and have fled from the Isthmus. Every specific charge relating to jobbery, to immorality, or to inefficiency, from whatever source it has come, has been immediately investigated, and in no single instance have the statements of these sensation mongers and the interested complainants behind them proved true. The only discredit inhering in these false accusations is to those who originate and give them currency, and who, to the extent of their abilities, thereby hamper and obstruct the completion of the great work in which both the honor and the interest of America are so deeply involved. It matters not whether those guilty of these false accusations utter them in mere wanton recklessness and folly or in a spirit of sinister malice to gratify some personal or political grudge.

Any attempt to cut down the salaries of the officials of the Isthmian Commission, or of their subordinates who are doing important work, would be ruinous from the standpoint of accomplishing the work effectively. To quote the words of one of the best observers on the Isthmus, "Demoralization of the service is certain if the reward for successful endeavor is a reduction of pay." We are undertaking in Panama a gigantic task—the largest piece of engineering ever done. The employment of the men engaged thereon is only temporary, and yet it will require the highest order of ability if it is to be done economically, honestly, and efficiently. To attempt to secure men to do this work on insufficient salaries would amount to putting a premium upon inefficiency and corruption. Men fit for the work will not undertake it unless they are well paid. In the end the men who do undertake it will be left to seek other employment with, as their chief reward, the reputations they achieve. Their work is infinitely more difficult than any private work, both because of the peculiar conditions of the tropical land in which it is laid and because it is impossible to free them from the peculiar limitations inseparably connected with Government employment; while it is unfortunately true that men engaged on public work, no matter how devoted and disinterested their services, must expect to be made the objects of misrepresentation and attack. At best, therefore, the positions are not attractive in proportion to their importance; and among the men fit to do the task only those with a genuine sense of public spirit and eager to do the great work for the work's sake can be obtained; and such men can not be kept if they are to be treated with niggardliness and parsimony in addition to the certainty that false accusations will continually be brought against them.

I repeat that the work on the Isthmus has been done and is being done admirably. The organization is good. The mistakes are extraordinarily few, and these few have been of practically no consequence. The zeal, intelligence, and efficient public service of the Isthmian Commission and its subordinates have been noteworthy. I court the fullest, most exhaustive, and most searching investigation of any act of theirs, and if any one of them is ever shown to have done wrong his punishment shall be exemplary. But I ask that they be decently paid, and that their hands be upheld as long as they act decently. On any other conditions we shall not be able to get men of the right type to do the work, and this means that on any other condition we shall insure, if not failure, at least delay, scandal, and inefficiency in the task of digging the giant canal.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 8, 1906.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I take it the usual order of the Senate will be followed on this occasion, and that the message and the accompanying documents will be printed and referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The message, with the accompanying documents, will be referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals and printed, in the absence of objection.

Mr. GORMAN. I think, Mr. President, the country will be highly gratified at the very extraordinary statements which the President makes in regard to the great work of building the isthmian canal. It is true that the newspaper press, and possibly some individuals in both Houses of Congress, have found reason to criticise the very extraordinary orders that have been issued in the prosecution of the work which has been undertaken. The President has submitted one of the most remarkable messages, I think, which has ever been sent to Congress, giving a certificate of perfect purity and of great efficiency to all connected with that work. It is true that he invites the closest scrutiny by Congress into the conduct of his officials, and Congress ought, in justice to him as well as to the individuals whom he has employed, to order an investigation and to make it perfect and complete. I trust before the Senate proceeds many days it will so instruct the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

The President, however, goes one step beyond that. Before an investigation has been had and there has been an opportunity to look into the facts or to read the report of the Commission he indorses the high salaries that have been paid to the officials connected with the canal. Under what is known as the "Spooner Act," those salaries of the Commission have been fixed by the President himself. I have no doubt that in that matter he has been guided simply by a desire to produce the best results. I have no doubt that under the influences by which any President would be surrounded in like circumstances he has exercised his best judgment; but I do not think we can all agree with him that the salaries paid to some of the officials connected with that organization, who are performng mere clerical duties in the city of Washington, have not been extravagant. However, Mr. President, that is a matter, as the case now stands, for Congress to deal with; and it ought to deal with it in a broad and liberal way, without attempting to embarass the President of the United States in the construction of this great work. But it would seem to me that a blanket indorsement of all that has been done and his insistence that these great salaries which have been paid shall be continued, will require careful consideration by Congress.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. GORMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. HALE. I thought the Senator was through. I will wait until he has completed his remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. GORMAN. The Congress of the United States placed the responsibility for the conduct of this work in the hands of the President, and gave him an appropriation to be used at his discretion, without estimates and without fixing the compensation of the officials, as is done in nearly all other instances in the conduct of governmental affairs. That was most unusual. I may say, Mr. President, it was a responsibility that ought not to have been placed upon the President. We have, however, since the trouble with Spain, grown into the habit of placing in the hands of executive officers millions of money to be expended without any accountability to Congress as to the details of the expenditure. This practice began while Mr. McKinley was President, Congress giving him $50,000,000 to be expended at his discretion. That was an emergency, it was said. I take it that was true; and yet we had emergencies prior to that time. We had the war with England, the war with Mexico, and our own internal troubles, far greater than the war with Spain, and yet no such action was taken in those days, because Congress had guarded carefully the purse strings of the nation. It then appropriated only upon estimates or upon specific statements as to the necessity for the expenditure of such appropriations. But this practice has been pursued as to other Departments of the Government until it has become substantially the rule in the Land Office, in the Post-Office Department, in the Agricultural Department, and in the War Department, almost without limit, to expend millions of dollars for material and the distribution to thousands of persons of salaries not known to Congress and not acted upon by Congress, until finally it has reached this great expenditure for the Panama Canal, estimated at $135,000,000 or $140,000,000, which we have placed in the hands of the President.

The President should not be sensitive if the representatives of the people in another branch and of the States in this branch shall determine—and wisely determine, as I think—to go back to the old rule, and the proper rule, of having estimates and determining governmental expenditures in detail. In the past that has been found the only method which will prevent extravagance in salaries and corruption in expenditures.

The condition relative to canal expenditures is not the fault of the President. It is the ill-advised action of Congress which has placed the President in this position, and which now, that the country has become aroused to inquiries as to the conduct of public officials, has made action necessary.

The President has met the case in that bold and manly fashion which seems to obtain with him as to all who are employed by his direction. Where he has been personally responsible for the employment of officials he finds nothing but good in their conduct. That is a manly characteristic; but I, for one, must be permitted to express the opinion that that is not the rule by which Governmental affairs should be carried on. No man living can tell what is to be the outcome in the expenditures for the construction of this canal across the isthmus; no man, so far as I know, has yet determined the character of the work, whether it shall be a canal that will cost $150,000,000 or one that shall cost $500,000,000. Therefore, with all due deference to the Executive, and with perfect faith in his desire to accomplish the result, and accomplish it by the best methods, I think he ought not to be sensitive to inquiry, and that inquiry perfect and complete ought to be made.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, in much that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] has said regarding the loose way of making appropriations that Congress has fallen into since the Spanish war, I agree. We are not yet out of the inflammatory influences of that war, and we have not yet got back to the old and better-fashioned way of making all appropriations in detail, upon estimates duly submitted, examined, and scrutinized by Congress, and reported in detail. I agree with the Senator in that. The sooner we return to the ancient way in this regard the better it will be in legislation for the Treasury and for the country.

In the little that I shall say now I will try to confine myself to the subject-matter presented by the message of the President.

The Spooner Act, Mr. President, deposited with the President enormous powers. It amplified the powers which the Executive has ordinarily exercised on important public measures; but it was done by Congress; it was discussed fully; it was framed by the distinguished and gifted Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], and, after having been prepared by him, was fully considered. At last in the emergency—that emergency being the mere building of the canal, which everybody recognized as a popular measure—this enormous lodgment of power in the President was assented to by Congress. Congress adjourned, leaving all this with the President. He had power to order work to be done, to make contracts, to make appointments, to fix salaries, and to do all the things that were essential to the carrying on of that great work. The language of the law framed by the Senator from Wisconsin is subject to no doubt. It was intended to be plenary, to commit to the President the authority that ordinarily would be exercised by Congress. For the time being the President has exercised that discretion. What else could he have done?

Now, in the early part of this session, to-day, what could the President do more than he has done? What is his plan as indicated by the message? The time has come when, Congress being in session, he commits back all of the extraordinary powers that have been committed to him to Congress for its action; he will no longer continue to or claim to fix these salaries, but he clearly has the right to express his opinion upon the rate of salaries and upon the men to whom the salaries have been paid. That is all he has done. He proposes, after receiving full reports from all the commissions that have been appointed, consulting engineers, including engineers from other countries, what? To go on and act? By no means; but to refer that to Congress, making such recommendation as he may think proper and fitting, but leaving it all to Congress.

Mr. President, everybody is fallible. Presidents make mistakes; Senators make mistakes; the world is full of mistakes; but the President has made no mistake here in committing this whole subject back to Congress, in giving up the enormous powers that have been lodged in him, and referring the subject-matter to Congress. I think the President and the country are to be congratulated at the moderation, the good sense, displayed by the President in realizinig that the time for the execution by him of the great powers lodged by the Spooner Act has passed and that Congress should consider this subject.

Mr. President, this being the policy of the President, sending it back to Congress and courting, to use his language, a full investigation, I hope there will be no delay on the part of the proper committee in taking up this great subject. The Committee on Interoceanic Canals, Mr. President, will find itself burdened day and night with the great labors thrown upon it by the President and by Congress in investigating and considering these great questions. They must take up the question of salaries. They must take up the question of progress and work as committed to the Commission through legislation, reported by them, if any is needed. They must take up the greatest question of all which will be committed to them by the President, or to us, and by us sent to them—deciding upon the type of canal. I do not envy the members of that committee in the work which they will have to do. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] is a member of the committee.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], one of the greatest lawyers and statesmen in the land, is a member of the committee. I hope he will give his time to the great questions to be considered by that committee, and that the committee will report, not delay and waiting and prolonging, because the people are impatient to know what is to be done, but the result of their conclusions.

On the question of salaries, I believe and think the committee will find that the President is right in what he indicates as his belief—that the large salaries attached to the important places, occupied by men who have upon their shoulders the responsibility of this work, are not too large. They are large compared with the ordinary scale of governmental salaries, but compared with the salaries which are paid by great corporations and great interests in the United States they are not unduly swollen.

But I hope the committee will early take into consideration all these subject-matters and report to the Senate as soon as may be, so that we may know for the future what are to be the conduct and the progress and the type of this great work. But certainly no man can complain that to-day the President has not turned the whole subject-matter over to Congress.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The message will be referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals and ordered to be printed.

MESSENGER FOR THE COMMITTEE ON MANUFACTURES.

Mr. HEYBURN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Manufactures be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ a messenger, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, at the rate of $1,440 per annum, until otherwise provided by law.

AFFAIRS OF MOROCCO.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I offer resolutions which I ask may now be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia submits resolutions which will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

Whereas it has of late been announced in the public press both of Europe and the United States that for the purpose of considering certain grave questions relative to the commercial and political affairs of Morocco, and of reaching an agreement and determination thereof, the governments of the leading powers of Europe, including Germany, France, Great Britain, Italy, Austria, and Spain, have agreed and arranged to hold in the near future, through delegates to be appointed by each of said Governments, a conference at Algeciras, in Spain, and that the Government of the United States has, by said European Governments been invited to participate through duly appointed delegates in the said conference; and

Whereas it is further announced in the public press that the President of the United States has, in compliance with said invitation, appointed delegates of the United States to and in said conference; and

Whereas the questions at issue relative to the affairs of Morocco, and the relation of European governments thereto, are reputed to be of such gravity, and the antagonistic demands of European governments to be so acute as to endanger the peace of Europe, as is evidenced by the publicly announced preparations for war in the dispositions of troops and fleets, and in the gathering of war material by several of said European powers, and as is also evidenced by press dispatches from the capitals of said powers, such as the following, which have been received and published in the newspapers of the United States, to wit:

"PARIS, December 31.

"Sensational papers here continue to publish lengthy telegrams from frontier towns reporting extraordinary activity of the military authorities. The evening edition of the Intransigeant to-day reproduces the alleged declaration of a superior Belgian staff officer concerning the military precautions Belgium is taking in order to preserve neutrality, and also a lengthy special dispatch showing the defensive strength of the main frontier points.

"Deputy Jaures reflects the pessimistic view of the socialistic element, writing in the Humanite that 'the antagonism in which France and Germany enter the Morocco conference causes a terrible uneasiness to weigh upon Europe, as the slightest untoward incident might unchain a catastrophe.' Most of the serious journals take a more conservative view, although all recognize the existence of widespread feelings of inquietude."

"According to official information received in London from Berlin, Germany not only demands that all the powers shall participate in the execution of reforms in Morocco, but that the work of watching the frontier shall be divided among them, thus realizing the fears expressed by an official of the foreign office in an interview last Thursday that the German delegates might insist on regulations clashing with what France considers her special privileges—for instance, the policing of the frontier.

"If Germany persists in this attitude in the conference, it is believed a most serious situation will arise, as France is certain to resist, and Great Britain will support France. The British Government, while believing the conference will finally reach a satisfactory settlement, realizes that persistence by Germany in her demands will cause irritation which will require all the efforts of the delegates to remove, and in this it expects the support of the United States, Spain, and Italy."

"ROME, January 6.

"Interest here in the conference on Moroccan reforms is growing. This is due to the predominant position that Italy will assume because of the importance of her delegate, the Marquis Visconti Venosta, who, when he was Italian minister of foreign affairs, concluded an agreement with France by which Italy abandoned her claims on Morocco in favor of France. This agreement was completed later by Foreign Minister Prinetti, who pledged Italy's help to France in Morocco, receiving in exchange the help of France in Tripoli.

"At that time Germany had shown no interest in Morocco, while Italy considered herself free to so act, Morocco not being included in the agreement of the triple alliance concerning the equilibrium of the Mediterranean. Now Germany, it is said, maintains that any question, even if it were not contemplated by the triple alliance, comes within the terms of the treaty, and that if Germany is attacked by any other power the other two members of the triple alliance—Austria and Italy—are compelled to assist her with arms. Thus the situation of Italy in the conference is becoming more delicate, as the conference may lead to war, though the prospects at present point toward peace;" and

Whereas our only legitimate concern with Moroccan affairs relates to the very limited commerce between that country and our own and is in no matter connected with the grave political controversy which has been carried on for some time past between Germany on the one side and France and England on the other as to the future political control of Morocco, it having been the settled policy of this Government since its foundation to abstain from taking part in such political controversies between European nations: It is therefore

I. Resolved by the Senate, That the President be respectfully requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to furnish the Senate with copies of the following papers:

(a) Such invitation or invitations as were received by this Government to participate in said conference, and of the reply or the replies of this Government thereto;

(b) Of any protocol, agreement, or other paper setting forth the objects of said conference, and the subjects with which it is expected to deal;

(c) Of all instructions sent to the delegates designated to represent this Government at said conference, with the names of said delegates;

(d) Of any agreement fixing the time and place for the meeting of said conference.

II. It is further resolved, That the President be respectfully requested to inform the Senate whether under the terms of said invitation and the acceptance thereof, or under the instructions given to said delegates on the part of the United States, they are limited in their authority to a participation in the deliberations, judgments, and awards of said conference to questions concerning commercial and business matters in which the Government and people of the United States have an interest, either present or prospective; or whether the said delegates on the part of the United States have authority to participate in the deliberations, judgments, or awards of said conference relative to the political affairs of Morocco and her political relations to one or more of the said foreign governments, and to the respective rights and powers of any one or more of said foreign governments relative thereto.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the resolutions may go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the resolutions will lie over.

Mr. BACON. I did not ask for the present consideration of the resolutions. I refrained from doing so because of the fact that the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] desires to address the Senate, and I did not wish to take up the time of the Senate to-day with any discussion upon the resolutions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions will lie over.

ATCHISON, TOPEKA AND SANTA FE RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. LONG submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate copies of the correspondence between the President and the Attorney-General, the President and the Secretary of the Navy, and the Attorney-General and special counsel, Messrs. Harmon and Judson, relating to a departure from the published rates by the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway Company in the transportation of coal for the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company, together with a copy of the opinion of Judge Philips in the contempt proceedings begun on account of said departure from published rates.

PERMANENT INDEFINITE APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ALDRICH submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be requested to report to the Senate in detail the amount of all permanent indefinite appropriations and to report whether any reason exists why all provisions of law making such appropriations should not be repealed and such appropriations hereafter be made annually on estimates furnished by the various Departments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXISTING STATUS IN SANTO DOMINGO.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The resolution submitted by Mr. TILLMAN on the 4th instant was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate, if not incompatible with the public welfare, as to the existing status in Santo Domingo; whether or not President Morales carried his Government with him when he disappeared from the capital or whether he left it behind, and whether the American officers who have been in charge of the custom-houses are still performing that work; and, if so, under what arrangement and by what authority.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire merely to enter a motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I understand the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] desires to offer an amendment of a general character to the pending resolution, and that upon that amendment he wishes to address the Senate; and I do not desire to stand in his way a moment in that respect. I merely wish to enter the motion and to give notice that I shall object in the future to the discussion of treaties and of our foreign relations in the open Senate, unless the Senate previously decides in the proper way that the discussion shall be in the open Senate. I think haphazard discussion of foreign relations in the morning hour, and of treaties pending in the Senate or pending in committee, is something contrary to the spirit of our rules and is an unwise policy to adopt.

I merely desire to give that notice. I do not wish to interfere in the slightest with the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, in reply to what the Senator from Massachusetts has just said, I wish to remark that I do not see how he can say or even think the Santo Domingo treaty is under discussion in connection with the pending resolution.

Mr. LODGE. I made no such suggestion.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator, if I understood him, and I was listening with both ears——

Mr. LODGE. I said I should object to treaties being discussed in open session unless the Senate, in the ordinary and proper way, ordered such discussion.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am not discussing the treaty at all, and do not propose to discuss it.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator brings that forward before anybody has accused him of doing it.

Mr. BACON. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the fact that the President of the United States discussed the treaty in his message.

Mr. LODGE. It does not make the slightest difference what the President of the United States does. We settle our own rules.

Mr. BACON. And it was read in open Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina has the floor.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. RAYNER. I offer an amendment in the way of a supplement to the resolution offered by the Senator from South Carolina.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland proposes an amendment to the resolution of the Senator from South Carolina, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate the United States ought not to assume any liability for the payment of any indebtedness of the republics of Central or South America to European or other powers, and ought not to interfere with foreign governments asserting against these republics civil rights in accordance with the principles and procedure of international law unless such assertion amounts to an attempt to permanently occupy their territory or to change their forms of government or subvert their political institutions; and

Resolved further, That the United States ought not by war, or the threat or menace of war, to enforce the performance of contractual obligations entered into between its own citizens and any of these republics, but in such cases should limit its interposition toward obtaining relief for the claimants to the friendly offices of the ministers or diplomatic agents of the United States.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, I presume it will not be inappropriate for me at this time to advance a few suggestions upon the subject-matter of the resolution that has just been read. It will be understood that in forwarding certain conclusions I have reached upon this subject I am only speaking for myself, and that I have no purpose and certainly no power to bind my party or any of my colleagues upon this floor to the acceptance of any views that I may now express.

We are to-day surging ahead with such velocity in the settlement of new questions in regard to our foreign policy with contiguous states that it seems to me it is well to have an interchange of opinion upon the open field of controversy in reference thereto, so that after consulting the compass and taking our bearings we may possibly formulate some steadfast line of conduct in connection therewith, or at least rescue some fundamental truths and principles from the confusion into which they have fallen.

The problems that we are now encountering in the administration of our foreign policy in this direction require mature thought and deliberation, and I plead with you at the outset, do not let us, because some trifling incident occurs of no significance, that does not affect our welfare or in the slightest degree menace our safety, lay down a code of principles and precedents that may be revised by our successors and repudiated and repealed by future generations.

It is not my intention in anything I may say to cast the slightest reflection upon the administration of the Department of State. While the questions at issue require a knowledge of constitutional and international jurisprudence, we all agree that the late lamented occupant of this portfolio upon the field of diplomacy was at least the peer of the brilliant line who preceded him and who have left the impress of their genius stamped upon the institutions of the Republic, and in so far as the President is concerned, feeling that he has been actuated by the best and highest impulses in the whole course of his administration and believing in his sincerity and integrity of purpose, no carping criticism shall come from me even in cases where he may have challenged precedent and strained authority to secure what, in his judgment, appeared to be a benefit and advantage to his country.

THE GENUINE MONROE DOCTRINE.

I would like it to be known that I subscribe to every sentiment of the Monroe doctrine; that is, the genuine doctrine, the old text and not the revised edition; the original document and not the counterfeit presentment. I stand by every utterance that it contains, but I reject the whole brood of heresies framed by modern paraphrasers and annotators, called the Monroe doctrine, but not a line of which ever sprang from the brain of the patriot whose name it bears.

The men who over three-quarters of a century ago rang a proclamation through the world that at that time convulsed the political fabric of continental Europe, would never, if living at this hour, admit the construction that is now placed upon it, and its founders and sponsors would never recognize it in its deformed and distorted shape. When a great invention in statesmanship dawns upon the world it seems proper that it should be associated with the name of its discoverer, and it ought not to be issued under a formula that no longer designates its ingredients and that has long since accomplished the purposes for which it was designed. When the Department of State issues a manifesto that is the product of its own genius it ought to be circulated under the name of its author, and in vindication of the memory of the dead and in defense of their rights I protest against the use of their names to any instrument that does not bear their signatures and to any doctrine that was never promulgated by their authority. As a usual thing, if a principle is right, it would concern me in a small degree whether it was fortified by tradition or had received the sanction of historic names. In this case the situation, however, is different, because we find that the President justifies his position upon the ground that he is merely enforcing a national policy, and that if we decline to act under existing emergencies it would be equivalent to abandoning a doctrine that is interwoven with our history and has become an integral part of our institutions. The charge is made that this new doctrine, which has been recently brought to our attention, is simply the old doctrine carried to its logical and inevitable conclusion in order to meet present conditions. This being the charge, it is absolutely essential in any discussion of this subject to find out whether this is the old doctrine or whether it is an entirely new one that has no connection with the old, and in order to ascertain this fact I would like for a moment to call to the witness stand the spirits of Jefferson, of Adams, and of Monroe and ask them whether they are innocent or guilty of the charge that the President has preferred against them. I call Adams because he was the real author of the declaration of 1823. The internal evidence of the message demonstrates this to be a fact, because in its first expression it deals with the question of our northwestern boundaries, a controversy that has been conducted by Adams and in connection with which he had employed almost the identical language contained in the message of President Monroe. Not only this, but Mr. Adams, narrating in his journal of December 6, 1845, a conversation with Mr. Bancroft, then in Mr. Polk's Cabinet, thus writes:

I said I approved entirely of Mr. Polk's repeated assertion of the principle first announced by President James Monroe, in a message to Congress, that the continents of North and South America were no longer to be considered as scenes for future European colonization. He said he had heard that this part of the message of Mr. Monroe had been inserted by him at my suggestion. I told him that was true; that I had been authorized by him to assert the principle in a letter of instruction to Mr. Rush, then Minister to England, and had written the paragraph in the very words inserted by Mr. Monroe in his message.

I would like to ask them this question: Was it ever contemplated that we should, under any circumstances, assume a protectorate, political or financial, over any of the Caribbean Islands or over any of the Latin-American Republics of Central or South America? Was not the motive that prompted the message one of self-interest to insure us against attack, and to enable us to hold the key to the situation in the event that any foreign power should attempt an invasion of American territory? I would like to ask Monroe: What did the message mean when it proclaimed—

It is impossible that the allied powers should extend their political system to any portion of either continent without endangering our peace and happiness.

We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interferred, and shall not interfere. But with the governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States.

Was it our purpose to proceed one step further than to announce that we would not permit foreign powers to subvert the governments of Central and South America and supplant them with monarchical institutions? Was not this the whole scope and the object of the proceeding? Was it ever intended that we should either interfere with the governments of the Republics themselves or prohibit foreign governments from asserting civil rights against them, accorded and universally recognized by the law of nations?

Now let us call Jefferson. Let me say a word about Jefferson. During the last campaign a leading advocate of the Republican party, in a vein of satire, in a brilliant address before the Republican convention, remarked that the Democratic party was spending the whole of its time in trying to find out what Thomas Jefferson would do if he were living. It could not, in its leisure moments, devote its time to a better purpose. I would rather have the spirit of this dead pilot wafting over the ship of state than any living pilot that I know of at the helm. He may have been a doctrinaire, but it is just this kind of doctrinaires who have shattered the idols of superstition, broken the fetters of bondsmen and liberated the world of thought. When in his retirement at Monticello he wrote to President Monroe:

> The question presented by the letters you have sent me is the most momentous which has ever been offered to my contemplation since that of independence. That made us a nation; this sets our compass and points the course which we are to steer through the ocean of time opening on us.

What was he talking about? No man living had at that time a deeper insight than he had into the profound significance of the causes that moved Monroe to sound an alarm that notified every tyrant on this earth that the Western Hemisphere was ablaze with the conflagration of liberty. He knew it meant one thing alone, nothing less and nothing more, and that was that a people once free upon this continent should never be enslaved again, and that no monarchy should ever be reared on this soil upon the ruins of republican institutions. He was thoroughly familiar with the jure divino autocracies of Europe and with their plans and expectations. He had been trained under the shadow of the Bastille. He was the mortal enemy of holy alliances and divine rights. He knew but one divine right, and that was the divine right of the people. In 1823 this old philosopher, from his knowledge of European conditions, understood the situation better than any man upon the American Continent. His faculties were growing stronger as his body became weaker. He was writing at this time upon every imaginable topic, philosophy, science, politics, literature, and religion, and thus surrounded when President Monroe solicited his opinion upon the suggestion of Mr. Canning, he sent the reply that has just been read. This is an old story, I know, in this Senate Chamber, but let me ask you what was this momentous question that Jefferson referred to? Was it a money question? Was it a financial question? Was he contemplating the probable bombardment of a Caribbean port to enforce the payment of a usurer's bond? Was his mind perplexed by a vision of a war conducted by bailiffs and constables and collectors in the interest of foreign pawnbrokers, whose weapons are pledges and debentures, and who, struggling with each other for preference and priorities in their insatiate chase for plunder, sweep down upon the pitiful revenues of these bankrupt and impoverished republics until they become prostrate supplicants at the exchequers of the world and are willing to yield their resources and concessions at any price or sacrifice that may be dictated in the gambling dens of the European stock market?

I am now trying to prove by the record, by the undisputed facts of history, by contemporaneous construction, the strongest evidence recognized by the canons of the law that the men who planted the seeds of the Monroe doctrine never contemplated that a despoiler's hand should enter the garden, take an alien weed, graft it on the parent stem and then claim that the harvest of this unholy wedlock is a natural growth that by organic process sprang from the virgin soil of the Republic. Let me once divest it of its nomenclature and I have gained the first point in this discussion. Then the new doctrine—call it what you will—must stand upon its own merits, not hallowed by prescription, and not infringing upon an ancient landmark.

THE PRESIDENT'S CONSTRUCTION OF THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

Now, what is the principle of construction? I presume that the Monroe doctrine, though not within the international code, is subject to the same elementary rules of interpretation that govern any other instrument. What is the cardinal rule? You take the language and then if there is a doubt, you take the environment and surroundings, the res gestæ of the transaction, the occasion that called for it, the emergency that produced it, cessante ratione lex cessat, the instructions to our ministers abroad, and principally the object that was to be accomplished, and from them you gather the intention. What is the President's interpretation? Upon pages 2 and 3 of a message that he has lately sent to the Senate marked "Customs revenues of the Dominican Republic," and also marked "Confidential," but from which the injunction of secrecy has been removed, the President makes the following statement:

> Under the accepted law of nations foreign governments are within their right, if they choose to exercise it, when they actively intervene in support of the contractual claims of their subjects. * * *
> An aggrieved nation can without interfering with the Monroe doctrine take what action it sees fit in the adjustment of its dispute with American States, provided that action does not take the shape of interference with their form of government or of the despoilment of their territory under any disguise. But, short of this, when the question is one of a money claim, the only way which remains, finally, to collect it is a blockade, or bombardment, or the seizure of the custom-houses, and this means, as has been said above, what is in effect a possession, even though only a temporary possession of territory. The United States then becomes a party in interest, because under the Monroe doctrine it can not see any European power seize and permanently occupy the territory of one of these Republics; and yet such a seizure of territory, disguised or undisguised, may eventually offer the only way in which the power in question can collect any debts, unless there is interference on the part of the United States.

With the most profound respect and admiration for the President, both for the office and for the individual, I deferentially reject this startling interpretation. I want the curtain just to rise for a moment now, for I will presently analyze this statement in detail, but right now, though it is a thrice-told tale and volumes have been written upon it, I want to call the actors upon the stage with the scenery mounted and the play in full rehearsal and see whether it leaves the same impression upon the minds of this distinguished audience as it does upon the President.

We all know that following the downfall of Napoleon the rulers of Prussia, Russia, and Austria formed a conspiracy against human rights known as the "Holy Alliance." Instead of it being a "Holy Alliance" it was the unholiest plot ever conceived against the rights of humanity. It was succeeded in 1818 by the Congress of Aix la Chapelle. In 1820 it assembled at Laybach, in Styria, and again it met in Verona in 1822. At the last conference the following blasphemous declaration was made a part of the treaty:

> The high contracting parties, well convinced that the system of representative government is as incompatible with the monarchical principle as the maxim of the sovereignty of the people is opposed to the principle of divine right, engage in the most solemn manner to employ all their means and unite all their efforts to put an end to the system of representative government wherever it is known to exist in the states of Europe and to prevent it from being introduced into those states where it is not known.

Now Canning appears upon the scene, and, what is a strange incident in this proceeding, and one that is hardly ever adverted to, is that Canning, after the rejection of his proposal to the United States for a European congress to consider the affairs of Spanish America, announced that Great Britain would not permit any European intervention in Spanish America, and the French minister, Prince de Polignac, at that time disclaimed the slightest intention of interfering and acquiesced in the judgment of Mr. Canning, that the subversion of South America by Spain was no longer a subject of practical consideration. President Monroe's message appears a few months after this event, dated December 2, 1823. Take all these facts together, the cause that was operating, the danger that threatened the influence at work, the utterances of the message and the participants in the event, and I would like some Senator now upon this floor to select a single utterance from any of the agencies in this affair that jusitifies the President's construction. Where is there a word that we should either at the point of war deny to foreign powers the right to assert their just demands against these republics or become substantially responsible for the liquidation of their claims?

What part of the Monroe doctrine is it that withdraws these States entirely from the domain of international procedure and commands us to compel them to keep their faith with the nations of the world? We asserted then, as we do now, that we would not permit any new establishment of monarchical institutions upon the Western Hemisphere. Self-interest and self-protection were the main motives that we had at that time, and if we add to this the sentiment that we were then, as we are now, in sympathy with Republican forms of government wherever they exist, and then add to this the further fact that the territory being adjacent to us and a menace to us in the hands of a foreign power, that we did not propose to acquiesce in its encroachment by any European monarch, and that we would oppose any further colonization by foreign governments upon the shores of this continent and you have the whole of the Monroe doctrine from its inception to its completion, from its first to its latest utterance at the time it was promulgated.

THE PRESIDENT'S DOCTRINE NOT THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

Now permit me to bring this doctrine quickly down to the present time, because it is absolutely necessary that this should be done in order to intelligently discuss the practical propositions involved.

Upon January 20, 1824, Henry Clay moved the following resolution, which was never acted upon in the Committee of the Whole in the House of Representatives:

> Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the people of these States would not see, without serious disquietude, any forcible intervention by the allied powers of Europe in behalf of Spain to reduce to their former subjection those parts of the continent of America which have proclaimed and established for themselves, respectively, independent governments, and which have been solemnly recognized by the United States.

During the debate upon the Panama Congress in 1826 James Buchanan introduced and passed in the House of Representatives the following resolution:

In the opinion of the House the United States ought not to form any alliance with all or any of the South American republics, nor ought they become parties with them to any joint declaration for the purpose of preventing the interference of any of the European powers with their independence or form of government, or to any compact for the purpose of preventing colonization upon the continent of America, but that the people of the United States should be left free to act in any crisis in such manner as their feelings of friendship toward these republics or as their own honor and policy may at the time dictate.

On April 29, 1848, during the war with Mexico, President Polk transmitted to Congress the Yucatan message, and thereupon a bill was introduced in the Senate to enable the President to take temporary military occupation of Yucatan. Then followed the discussion in which Mr. Calhoun made one of the most effective arguments in his public career, concluding with the memorable words that he had simply discharged his duty to his country and to the Cabinet of which he was the only surviving member.

Then we come to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to which I will not now refer, because the less said about it the better, de mortuis nil nisi bonum, and with the exception of the French intervention in Mexico, to which I shall presently make particular reference in another connection, it brings us to a brief consideration of the Venezuelan message of President Cleveland, sent to Congress on December 17, 1895. In the House of Representatives, and in an humble way on many other occasions, I was a firm adherent of the Administration of President Cleveland. Men sometimes are forgotton when they live. Posterity will remember him, and he will occupy a high and isolated place in the annals of the Republic. I regret to say that it was impossible for me to accept the views of the Administration in the Venezuelan boundary controversy. If the Monroe doctrine had not been appealed to and our intervention had been placed upon an entirely distinct ground and on behalf of Venezuela, and at her solicitation we had demanded as an international right that in order to avoid war between Great Britain and Venezuela that controversy should have been submitted to arbitration, it would have presented an entirely different aspect. I can not for a moment reconcile to any American precedent or to any principle of international law the proposition that in an honest dispute over a boundary line between a South American and a foreign state that we had a right to dictate the method of adjustment and by the menace of war compel submission to our terms, or that the Monroe doctrine ever contemplated such an interference upon our part.

When Mr. Bayard submitted to Lord Salisbury the dispatch of Mr. Olney, it was sent by Lord Salisbury to the ablest lawyers in the Kingdom and to the law officers of the Crown for their opinion. It was submitted on the 7th of August, 1895, and this investigation accounts for the fact that there was no communication sent from Lord Salisbury to the British minister in the United States until November 26, 1895. A statement that is peculiarly relevant to the present situation appears in this correspondence which I shall now cite, and I have emphasized the Venezuelan incident for this purpose, and I cite it because Lord Salisbury and the eminent jurists who had evidently prepared his answer seem to agree with Secretary Olney upon a proposition that comes right home to us with pointed force and irresistible conclusion upon this occasion, and comes to us in a discussion in which Secretary Olney had proceeded beyond the utmost limit of any of his predecessors in the assertion of our rights under the message of President Monroe. Listen to the statement of Secretary Olney, the most liberal constructionist upon the Monroe doctrine who has ever presided over the Department of State, and tell me whether it does not sustain every proposition for which I am contending:

The Monroe doctrine does not establish any general protectorate by the United States over other American States. It does not relieve any American state from its obligations, as fixed by international law, or prevent any European power directly interested from enforcing such obligations or from inflicting merited punishment for the breach of them. It does not contemplate any interference in the internal affairs of any American state. It does not justify any attempt on our part to change the established form of government, altering that form according to our own will and pleasure. The rule in question has but a single purpose and object. It is that no European power or combination of European powers shall forcibly deprive an American state of the right and power of self-government and of shaping for itself its own political fortunes and destinies.

In the answer from the British foreign office there was this striking passage, not a line or an assertion of which was ever contradicted or denied in any subsequent correspondence upon the subject:

Whatever may be the authority of the doctrine laid down by President Monroe, there is nothing in his language to show that he ever thought of claiming this novel prerogative for the United States. It is admitted that he did not seek to assert a protectorate over Mexico or the States of Central and South America. Such a claim would have imposed upon the United States the duty of answering for the conduct of these States, and consequently the responsibility of controlling them. His sagacious foresight would have led him energetically to deprecate the addition of so serious a burden to those which the rulers of the United States have to bear. It follows of necessity that if the Government of the United States will not control the conduct of these communities, neither can it undertake to protect them from the consequent attaching of any misconduct to which they may be guilty toward other nations. If they violate in any way the rights of another state or its subjects, it is not alleged that the Monroe doctrine will assure them the assistance of the United States in escaping from any reparation which they may be bound by international law to give. Mr. Olney expressly disclaims such an interference from the principles he lays down.

THE ROOSEVELT DOCTRINE.

I hope that I have now shown that the present doctrine is not the Monroe doctrine and that, therefore, it ought to have a new and proper name. We might call it the Dillingham doctrine, or, if the Senator from Alabama does not object, the Reader doctrine, or, what is better still, let us copyright it with a name that will surround it with proper dignity and command the respect of the nations of the world, and call it the Roosevelt doctrine.

It becomes necessary for us now to analyze this new doctrine of the President, to see whether we will adopt and make it a part of our international code. The President has encountered a complicated situation, and if his conception of it is correct he has applied the remedy with a master's hand. If he has made an accurate diagnosis, his treatment will undoubtedly eradicate the malady. I know a distinguished physician whose remedies are simply marvelous. There is only one trouble about the doctor, and that is he generally treats his patients for the wrong disease. He is eminently successful because his patients not being afflicted with the disease that his diagnosis points to, they invariably recover from it. What is the President's diagnosis of this case? It is based upon two propositions:

First. His first proposition is that the only way, except by actual war, that one nation can forcibly collect a money claim against another is by blockade, bombardment, or the seizure of its custom-houses, and under the accepted law of nations foreign governments are within their rights, if they choose to exercise it, when they actively intervene in support of the contractual claims of their subjects.

Second. His second proposition is that the United States then becomes a party in interest, so far as American states are concerned, because under the Monroe doctrine it could not see any European power seize and occupy the territory of any of these republics.

Upon the first proposition I respectfully deny that foreign nations are within their rights when they actively intervene in favor of the contractual claims of their subjects. With great deference to the President, this proposition is at war with the elementary principles of international law. There are some exceptions that sustain his statement in countries where anarchy and a failure to administer justice prevail, but with an exception in cases that are sui generis the rule is an inflexible and unbending one, precisely to the contrary tenor of what the President states it to be. In this country nearly every Secretary of State, including Madison, Adams, Clay, Webster, Calhoun, Marcy, Seward, and Blaine, have given the broad denial to suggestions of this character, so that until this new doctrine was promulgated it was considered a postulate and a fundamental maxim of international law that governments would not interfere in behalf of the contractual claims of their citizens, except through the channels of diplomacy and the proper presentation of the claims by their ministers. Of course, if the President is in error upon this point, which is the major premise of his argument, his conclusions fall to the ground, and, therefore, owing to its great importance I now present to you a line of precedents taken from the text writers that establish the true doctrine in this regard, and in doing so I desire to say that I am only referring to the principal ones, and that a volume could be filled with them if it became necessary to give the whole of them.

With regard to the contracts of an individual born in one country with the government of another, most especially when the individual contracting is domiciliated in the country with whose government he contracts and formed the contract voluntarily, for his own private emolument and without the privity of the nation under whose protection he has been born, he has no claim whatsoever to call upon the government of his nativity to espouse his claims, this Government having no right to compel that with which he voluntarily contracted to the performance of that contract. (Mr. John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State, to Mr. Salmon, April 29, 1823.)

The Government of the United States is not bound to interfere to secure the fulfillment of contracts made between their citizens and foreign governments, it being presumed that before entering into such contracts the disposition and ability of the foreign power to perform its obligations are examined, and the risk of failure taken into consideration. In cases of personal hardship and loss, however, like the present, the Department does not decline forwarding a statement of the grievance, with a recommendation of the claim, to the friendly offices of the minister of the United States. (Mr. Marcy, Secretary of State, to Mr. Fowler, July 17, 1856.)

The people who go to these regions (South America) and encounter great risks in the hope of great rewards must be regarded as taking all the circumstances into consideration, and can not with reason ask their Government to complain that they stand on a common footing with native subjects in respect to the alleged wants of an able, prompt, and conscientious judiciary. We can not undertake to supervise the arrangements of the whole world for litigation, because American citizens voluntarily expose themselves, to be concerned in their deficiencies. (Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, to Mr. Burton, April 28, 1866.)

Citizens of the United States who take up their abode in a foreign country and enter into contracts with the citizens or public authorities there are presumed to make their engagements in accordance with, and subject to, the laws of the country where the obligations imposed by the contract are to be fulfilled, and are ordinarily remitted to the remedies afforded by those laws for the redress of grievances resulting from breaches or nonfulfillment of such contracts.

Instances may sometimes occur in which there has been a denial or miscarriage of justice in the courts. In such cases the good offices of the Department may properly be invoked on behalf of the claimant. The claims now in question are not deemed to be of a character which calls for such interposition. (Mr. Fish, Secretary of State, to Mr. Wing, December 9, 1873.)

The claimants in this case stand in the relation of parties to a contract into which they voluntarily entered with the Government of Brazil against which they now seek indemnity for losses sustained, resulting, as it is said, from acts of that Government alleged to be in contravention of their contract. It is a well-established rule of this Government that in such cases the parties are remitted for the redress of injuries resulting from any breach or disregard of the contract to the laws of the country in which the agreement was entered into and where it is to be performed. This rule, so far as known, is one generally recognized by other civilized powers. (Mr. Fish, Secretary of State, to Mr. Pratt, July 17, 1875.)

This Government does not interfere diplomatically to enforce claims of actual citizens of the United States arising out of contracts voluntarily entered into by them. When a contract is made by them under such circumstances the person is expected to have considered the ability and the readiness of the other party to carry out the contract. In this case particularly such instructions could not be issued. (Mr. Fish, Secretary of State, to Mr. Swann, May 4, 1876.)

A breach of contract virtually entered into between a citizen of the United States and a foreign government with which this Government holds diplomatic relations, is not regarded as ground for official interference on behalf of the citizen. (Mr. Evarts, Secretary of State, to Mr. Thomas, September 12, 1878.)

In regard to claims of that character (contracts) it is a rule of universal acceptance and practice that the person thus voluntarily entering into a contract with the government of a foreign country or with the subjects or citizens of such foreign power, for any grievances he may have or losses he may suffer resulting from such contract, is remitted to the laws of the country with whose government or citizens the contract is entered into for redress. (Mr. Blaine, Secretary of State, to Mr. Logan, March 22, 1881.)

We must draw a careful and well-defined distinction between contracts and torts, not technical but nevertheless in international procedure differing from each other just as clearly as they do under the strictest rules of common-law pleading. We have and will exercise the right of intervention whenever a foreign government tortiously deprives an American citizen of his property, his liberty, or his life and declines to afford him proper redress therefor. This distinction has been so well taken by one of the most eminent men who has occupied the position of Secretary of State that it is well to quote his language in support of this proposition:

It has not been customary for this Department officially to interfere in behalf of citizens of the United States who may have entered into contracts with foreign governments, which the latter may not have fulfilled. The Department has usually limited its interposition to authorizing the proper diplomatic agent of the Government abroad to use his personal good offices toward obtaining relief for the claimant. The reason for this policy is that claims based on contract are supposed to stand upon a very different footing from those which arise from injuries to person and property committed by the authorities of any foreign government. (Mr. Fish, Secretary of State, to Mr. Bassett, June 27, 1870.)

By adopting a foreigner, under any form of naturalization, as a citizen, this Government does not undertake the patronage of a claim which he may have upon the country of his original allegiance or upon any other Government.

To admit that he can charge it with this burden would allow him to call upon a dozen Governments in succession, to each of which he might transfer his allegiance to urge his claim. Under such a rule the Government supposed to be indebted could never know when the discussion of a claim would cease. All Governments are, therefore, interested in resisting such pretensions. I infer from the memorials of Mr. Vigil and of the legislature of New Mexico that the claims to which you refer arose from contracts, expressed or implied, with the Mexican Government. Our long-settled policy and practice has been to decline the formal intervention of the Government, except in cases of wrong and injury to person and property, such as common law denominates torts and regards as inflicted by force, and not the results of voluntary engagements or contracts.

In cases founded upon contract the practice of this Government is to confine itself to allowing its minister to exert his friendly good offices in commending the claim to the equitable consideration of the debtor without committing his own Government to any ulterior proceedings.

PRECEDENTS AGAINST THE PRESIDENT'S POLICY.

It seems to me that the President is equally in error, if we are at all to be controlled by usage or precedent, in stating that the seizure of a custom-house and a blockade are equivalent to the seizure of territory within the meaning of the Monroe doctrine and that it is our duty to interfere in Central and South America if foreign governments attempt to enforce their rights by this method. In the first place, as I have attempted to show, strictly contractual claims will not be asserted by any such process, and foreign governments recognize this rule just as well as we do, the exceptions being where there is a discrimination of justice or where there is a condition of lawlessness and a failure to comply with the usages of civilized society. If the citizens of foreign governments are subjected to a tortious invasion of their rights with the connivance of any of the Republics of Central or South America, and after every effort made to obtain indemnity without avail, foreign governments proceed to place the revenues of the offending government under their control so as to obtain redress, I deny that there is any seizure of territory within the meaning of the Monroe doctrine to invoke our interference, and I will give you now three striking illustrations in which this very process was resorted to and in which we never asserted any right to intervene or ever made the claim that under the Monroe doctrine it was within our duty or province so to do.

The first incident is that of Mexico. The English claim originated in tort. Under the orders of Miramon a body of rioters had broken into the residence of the British legation, plundered its vaults, and had taken a large amount of money, the property of English citizens. The claim of France was also one for indemnity for wrongs committed by Mexico.

In this connection I direct your attention to an important communication sent by Secretary Seward on August 23, 1862, to Mr. Dayton, the American minister in Paris, which reads as follows:

This Government, relying on the explanations which have been made by France, regards the conflict as a war involving claims by France which Mexico has failed to adjust to the satisfaction of her adversary, and it avoids intervention between the belligerents.

Of course we know that these explanations were false, and that the Emperor Napoleon was then engaged in the treacherous attempt to place an Austrian archduke upon the Mexican throne. What I want to emphasize, however, is that the correspondence of Mr. Seward proves that there was no reference whatever to the Monroe doctrine, and no attempt to interfere with the proceedings that the European governments had undertaken to enforce their rights until within a brief period before the time that Maximilian landed at Vera Cruz. Not only this, but afterwards, and after the close of our civil war, Mr. Bigelow, our minister to France, who succeeded Mr. Dayton, absolutely agreed to recognize Maximilian upon the withdrawal of French troops from Mexican territory.

This incident establishes what I am contending for, and that is that the Monroe doctrine does not come into operation until there is an actual attempt upon the part of foreign governments to subvert republican institutions upon this hemisphere.

The next incident is one of extreme weight and consequence in this connection. The seizing of Venezuelan war vessels and the bombardment of Venezuelan ports by Great Britain and Germany have been cited by Mr. George F. Tucker, of the Boston bar, in his excellent treatise upon the Monroe doctrine, one of the most instructive and concise expositions upon the subject that I have ever read, as one of the first attempts in history to enforce commercial demands by virtual acts of war. Why did we not interefere in this case? This was an excellent opportunity to put the new doctrine into practical execution. We desisted because Great Britain and Germany both assured us that it was not their purpose to take permanent possession of Venezuelan territory. Under the new dispensation it was a casus belli, and it comes distinctly within the President's proclamation. Under the President's well-chosen terms it was a case in which the United States immediately became a party in interest, but our failure to interfere is demonstrative proof that we did not consider any attempt short of an attempt to subvert the autonomy of Venezuela as any breach of the Monroe doctrine or of any other doctrine incorporated in our diplomatic code.

The third episode is the strongest of the three. For an offense to her dignity England levied a fine of $75,000 upon Nicaragua. Upon failure to pay the fine British ships of war appeared at Corinto and armed forces took possession of the town. It was an unnecessary and unjustifiable proceeding upon the part of Great Britain, and here was an opportune occasion to summon the specter of Monroe to revisit the pale glimpses of the moon.

Frantic efforts were made to induce the State Department to act, but it stood by with grim and resolute silence and never sent a political economist or an auditor or an adjuster to apportion the revenues of Nicaragua, but permitted the emaciated Republics of Costa Rica, San Salvador, and Guatemala to subscribe a sufficient sum to liquidate the indebtedness. This was a defiant act upon the part of Great Britain, close to our own borders in the haunted churchyard of the Clayton-Bulwer apparition, but it never disturbed the tranquil slumbers of Adams and Monroe, and they never for a moment left their sepulchers to harrow up our souls or unfold the secrets of their prison house. I think that I have now established two propositions:

First. That the President is in error when he states that "we are within our rights and other governments are within their rights when they actively intervene in support of the contractual claims of their citizens."

Second. That he is equally in error, if we are to be governed by precedent, when he states that "upon the seizure of a custom-house to enforce claims recognized by international law in South or Central America we become a party in interest under the Monroe doctrine, and must prevent this action upon the part of foreign governments."

THE NEW POLICY.

This brings us to a review of what this new doctrine really is, and it reveals a condition that will contribute largely to the entertainment of those who investigate it. We must realize that this new Monroe doctrine is strictly a financial doctrine. The tragic figures of Bolivar and Miranda and a hundred other heroes who swept up and down the Spanish Main have disappeared from view, and the Santo Domingo Improvement Company and the Westendorps, of Amsterdam, and Messrs, Bichoffscheim & Goldschmidt now appear upon the scene. Arma virumque cano is an epic dream. The theme is money, the legend is cash, and the foreign hordes who are advancing into the State Department are a syndicate of relentless mercenaries and money lenders who traffic in calamity, look upon national misfortunes as so much merchandise, and who for a venal profit would call a vendue and auction to the highest bidder the liberties of mankind.

Look at the situation for a moment and see whether I am exaggerating it. Let us take the Dominican complication. How did the Dominican indebtedness originate? Let me give you one item of it. I read from the thirty-first annual report of the Council of the Corporation of Foreign Bondholders, incorporated by an act of Parliament July, 1898:

1869.—Six per cent loan for £757,700. The Government of Santo Domingo entered into a contract with Mr. E. H. Hartmont, by which the latter agreed to provide a sum of £420,000 for the construction of roads and railways, of which £100,000 was to be retained by him as compensation, the nominal amount of the loan to be fixed by the contractor. The Government on its part undertook to pay, for the service of the interest and sinking fund, an annuity of £58,900 in half-yearly installments, for twenty-five years. Messrs. Peter Lawson & Co., acting for Mr. Hartmont, accordingly issued in London £757,700 in bonds secured upon a first charge on the customs duties of the ports of Santo Domingo and Puerto Plata, the guano royalties, and the revenues arising from the forests and mines of the province of Samana.

The bonds were redeemable in twenty-five years by a 1¾ per cent accumulative sinking fund. The issue price was 70 per cent, but at this price the loan received little support from the public, and was subsequently disposed of at rates ranging from 55 to 50 per cent to Messrs. Bichoffscheim & Goldschmidt and others, by whom they were later disposed of to the public. The Government only acknowledges receipt of £38,000. Mr. Hartmont, however, asserted that he tendered personally to the Government £211,110, but that it was not accepted owing to negotiations for annexation in progress at that time with the United States. Interest on this loan was paid for three years, but it was stated that these payments were made by the contractor and not by the Government.

What do you think of this? One hundred thousand pounds to Mr. Hartmont for negotiating the loan, the whole loan taken by Messrs. Bichoffscheim & Goldschmidt for 50 per cent, and Santo Domingo paid the sum of £38,000 out of the transaction, for which it gave its bonds for £750,700 and agreed to pay for interest and sinking fund £58,900 a year, £20,000 a year more than the whole amount of principal that it received, and this, shades of Monticello! is what Jefferson contemplated as the most momentous question that had agitated the Republic since the Declaration of Independence.

And this is the subject over which we are to have war. What a glorious war this will be! From Salamis to Trafalgar no such war was ever fought before. On the one side, Belgium's invincible armada, on the other, the converted scows and rowboats of the lamented Morales. Every war that has been waged either upon sea or land has always involved some principle. This will not only involve some principle, but it will involve a large amount of interest. The battle cry of the British navy has been "England expects every man to do his duty;" this battle cry shall be "Belgium expects every man to collect his money." The dying words of Lawrence were "Don't give up the ship, boys;" here the flag ship shall signal to the fleet, Don't give up your coupons, boys; and as the battle closes the valiant crew of brokers, bankers, underwriters, and promoters, paraphrasing the thrilling words of Perry, can flash a cable to the Westerndorps of Amsterdam: The revenue cutters and the custom-houses of Puerto Plata and Monte Christi have fallen; we have met the enemy and they are ours. Advance the bid on Dominican bonds.

While I am upon this branch of the subject let me refer to a statement lately made to the Baltimore Sun in a communication from its Washington correspondent that contains an interesting extract from the report of the corporation of foreign bondholders, which shows the effect that this new policy of the President has had upon the price of the securities of these American Republics, and which reads as follows, showing the rise in these investments since the beginning of this agitation. An appreciation of this sort would generally be a benefit, but in this case it is an absolute detriment, because it compels these governments to settle their obligations at a price far overreaching the speculative figures at which they were purchased. This table gives the prices of the bonds of eight of these countries at the end of September of each year:

Countries.	1901.	1903.	1904.	1905.
Colombia	14	24½	24	44
Costa Rica A bonds	16½	22	26	56
Costa Rica B bonds	15	19	19½	46
Guatemala	13	21	24	39¼
Honduras	5	4½	6	13
Nicaragua	57½	60½	59	79
Paragua	23	29	35	50
Uruguay	49½	58½	59½	72
Venezuela	26	32¼	42	51

I will tell you what I am willing to do. The Monroe doctrine is a Democratic doctrine, but I am perfectly willing to stand upon a Republican construction of it. You may search through every volume and pamphlet that have ever been written upon this subject and in no single one of them will you find a more concise and at the same time a more comprehensive definition of what the Monroe doctrine really is and what it was intended to be than you will in its exposition by Secretary Seward in the following language. I read from the instruction of Mr. Seward to Mr. Kilpatrick, our Chilean minister, in 1866:

The Government of the United States will "maintain and insist with all the decision and energy which are compatible with our existing neutrality that the republican system which is accepted by any one of those (South American) States shall not be wantonly assailed, and that it shall not be subverted as an end of a lawful war by European powers;" but beyond this position the United States Government will not go, nor will it consider itself hereby bound to take part in wars in which a South American republic may enter with a European sovereign when the object of the latter is not the establishment in place of a subverted republic of a monarchy under a European prince.

RECEIVERSHIP OVER FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS.

We have lately had an exposition of this doctrine, however, which proceeds a step further than any announcement that has ever been made upon this subject, and it comes from no less distinguished a source than the Secretary of War, as capable an adviser as the President could possibly select, and who, by reason of his integrity and intellectual power, has maintained the respect and confidence of his countrymen, regardless of party, in the commanding positions he has occupied in their service. Secretary Taft, in the frank and candid manner that generally characterizes his public utterances, in an addres lately delivered before the Republican convention of Ohio, speaking of our relations with Santo Domingo, says we are to take temporary possession of the island as receiver. I have looked carefully over the various provisions of the Constitution of the United States, and I find no clause that empowers this Government to act as a receiver for any other government. It might be supposed that through some inadvertence or error on the part of the printer it was omitted from the original proof sheet of the Constitution, but in examining the debates of the convention and the notes of Mr. Madison I am unable to discover that there was any discussion of this receivership matter in that body. This is a new project, therefore, and heralded by so high an authority it is worthy of consideration. The Secretary of War never makes a suggestion, even at a feast or a convention, that does not carry weight with, it, and we must not reject this proposition simply on account of the novelty of the conception. The Senator from Indiana, as I shall presently show, claims that we are a trustee for all the uncivilized nations of the earth, and now if you add to this that in the meantime we are to act as receivers for them you confer upon us a duty that is by no means a sinecure.

I would like to know who will act as receiver? It will evidently be impossible for Mr. Taft to perform these functions. As Secretary of War, upon frequent occasions ex officio Secretary of State, constructive governor-general of the Philippines, and, in the absence of the President, Acting President of the United States, I am quite sure that he has not the time to act as receiver for all the impecunious people on this earth. We will therefore evidently have to provide a new portfolio to be known as the "department of foreign receiverships" and a new secretary to be known as the "secretary of foreign bankruptcy." This official will, undoubtedly, have a sufficient amount of work to occupy his time, because there are a large number of people in the territory to be covered ready to go into the hands of a receiver, from Yucatan to Tierra del Fuego. The question arises, Are these receiverships to be temporary or permanent? Take the receivership of Santo Domingo. Is it for the purpose of reorganization or liquidation? If for the former purpose, how long will it take to reorganize its finances, and, if it is permanent in character, who is ultimately to become its distributee? And then comes the serious question, Who are our clients in this controversy? In Santo Domingo we claim that the Government ought to be supported, because it is in favor of protecting American interests. In Venezuela American interests were with the revolutionists. Is this to be our policy—that we are to be allied with the party that is in favor of American interests? Is it not time, I appeal to you, to call a halt in this entire programme? Are we not trying to accomplish too much within a brief period? Are we not venturing beyond our limits as a world power and intruding officiously into affairs that do not possibly concern us?

I would also like to know under what clause of the Constitution we derive the right to act as receivers and take possession of the custom-houses of other countries. I would be obliged to some Senator upon this floor to select the provision that confers this authority upon the Executive. If this is an Executive function I shall be extremely grateful to anyone to point me to the article that so defines it. Make no mistake about this. We are now in possession of the custom-houses of Santo Domingo and collecting their revenues. Please give me the warrant and precept under which this process has been issued. If there is a statute for it, let me have it and I will ascertain whether there is any sanction for the enactment. If it is a custom, where and when has it ever been practiced or pursued? Is it not a fact that among all the interpreting decisions of the Supreme Court, among all the archives of the State Department, there is no precedent or example that justifies this assumption of authority? I am not fastidious or technical upon this point. I am not what you may call a strict constructionist of the Constitution, if by strict construction you mean that I would sacrifice its intention to its phraseology or its spirit to its letter. Give it now the broadest exposition that it can stand, the most liberal interpretation that it is capable of, treat it magnanimously, as the Supreme Court has done in its various revisions and translations, and I challenge you to find a single grant or franchise it contains that justifies this usurpation. I am not criticising the President now. If he has made a mistake, he has done so with a love for his country and a devotion to its people, and not for the purpose of personal aggrandizement, but, in all justice and fairness, has he not fallen into the gravest possible error in supposing that he has the right to execute a treaty before the treaty itself is ratified? It is childish to assert that the Senate is jealous of its rights or its prerogatives. That is not the point. The point I apprehend is that you, as the representatives of your States, will see to it with unabated vigilance that there is no intrusion by the Executive upon legislative functions and no encroachment upon constitutional limitations. I have no feeling, certainly no partisan feeling, upon this matter. Perhaps what has been done has been done for the best, but I want to avoid the precedent, because precedents live forever and bad precedents make good law. We are dealing now with a most important branch of our system.

This is the dead line of the Constitution, and the slightest trespass is fatal to the organic life of our Government. The limitation upon the Executive power is the keynote of the instrument, and when once you rend that cord in twain you destroy the delicate adjustment of the master's hand. It is the implied covenant that underlies the grant. It was the pillar of fire that led us through the stormy days of the state conventions to the shores of our deliverance. All the guaranties of the charter, habeas corpus, civil rights, the liberty of the press and religious freedom pale into insignificance before its light, and, if I am correct in the position I am assuming, I would like it once and forever understood that no treaty with foreign nations and that no compact, convention, or protocol in the nature of a treaty shall be performed and carried into practical effect, and no custom-house shall be seized, no revenues administered, no status quo established by any minister or military commander until the act of the agent is confirmed by the principal and the negotiations of the President are submitted to the only body under the Constitution that has the right to reject or ratify them.

THE CONDITION OF CENTRAL AND SOUTH AMERICA.

Look for a moment at the situation of a number of the states that are involved in these controversies. Of course I am not speaking now of the states where order prevails and whose governments are stable and responsible. We know that they are in a condition of constant upheaval and are resting upon a political volcano. I will not dignify by the name of revolution the sedition and turmoil that since their liberation have raged within their borders. In some of them the public franchise is a mockery and a travesty upon republican institutions. In the city of Buenos Ayres, for instance, at the last election, with 800,000 population, 2,000 votes were cast, and they were largely the votes of persons who had been dead and buried for an indefinite period of time. In a number of instances their presidents are military dictators whose chief ambition seems to be to acquire as large a fortune as possible from the public funds before the time arrives for their assassination.

It will be utterly impossible for us to follow our citizens into these realms and inferentially become the ally of every rioter or usurper who regards the domain of his country as his private emolument and who is willing for a consideration to part with every concession upon its soil, with a full knowledge that they will be forfeited by the tyrant who succeeds him. Those who are in control are entirely justified when they announce to us that we have no right to interfere with them. There is a ruler now upon the republican throne of Venezuela, "half patriot, half brigand," who extended a hospitable invitation to the navies of France and the United States to bombard him, and while the whole world was smiling at the grotesqueness of his blustering pretensions, when you analyze the philosophy of the situation, he was unqualifiedly right. He proceeded to forfeit the concessions of our citizens, claiming that they were in league with his opponents. We demanded arbitration, and when he took refuge under the principle that the controversy was pending in the Venezuelan courts we answered him by saying, "You own your courts, and you can induce them to render any decision that you desire; we are therefore not bound by their judgment, and we shall bombard you if you do not submit to arbitration." Mr. President, we might as well admit that he is on the right side of this question and the law is with him. Corrupt or not, we know that these concessionaries must submit to the judgment of the courts that have jurisdiction over them. We can not bombard Venezuela because these tribunals have rendered an improper decision. Let us reverse positions for a moment. Here are hundreds of decisions flooding us every day in this country, from county, circuit, and municipal courts, and from district, appellate, and supreme tribunals. Suppose that every jury that rendered an improper verdict and every judge who pronounced an unsatisfactory decision were to be bombarded. Why, the land would reverberate with the roar of cannon and the firmament would be draped in fire.

THE FLAG DOES NOT FOLLOW A CONTRACT.

The President takes the ground that these States should pay their honest debts. That is a proper ground to take. If they repudiate them, says the President, we will intervene and compel them to fulfill their obligations. This was the purpose declared by him in one of the earlier communications made upon the subject, which at the time was profanely criticised as policing South America. The method of intervention that we were to resort to was the seizure of their custom-houses and a virtual assumption of suretyship for them, because it stands to reason that the moment we come into possession of their revenues we can never abandon their administration, but must continue their collection until the indebtness is liquidated. This makes us the guarantor of these claims. This will force them to be honest, says the President. I humbly take a position that is diametrically opposed to this doctrine. I say that such a policy on our part will deprive them of every motive for honesty and will close up for them every avenue of ambition. I would let them realize that we do not intend to stand sponsor for a dollar of their indebtedness and that, like every other people, they must perform the obligations of civilized society and that, if their property is rightfully seized upon their failure to do so, we do not intend to intervene unless there is an attempt to subvert their institutions. This is the only method by which you can inculcate proper lessons of national honor and good faith. Then whenever a rioter engages in a revolution he will understand that he can not seize a custom-house for his own emolument, because that is what a South American revolution generally means until he secures the claims of foreign creditors. There will be less revolution then, because when you take away the custom-house from a South American revolutionist you take away the inspiring motive that fans his patriotism into flame. I have the strongest friendship and the deepest sympathy for these people. Their ruling classes represent a spirited and chivalric race, and I cherish the fondest hopes for their future welfare. Let me take the liberty of telling them, however, in the places where these troubles occur that they will never emerge from bondage until they become a reliant and self-dependent people; that they will never take their place among the nations of the earth by surrendering their custom-houses into the hands of foreign constables and collectors; that they will never be recognized as factors in the world's progress until they grasp the rudimentary principles of national honor, until they learn that there can be no fellowship or communion between liberty and corruption, and that a republic whose rulers are venal and whose assemblies are purchasable constitutes the most abject form of despotism, and though the bosoms of their people may pant with a love of liberty, though they may ostensibly exercise the privileges of freemen, their very suffrages are the emblems of servitude and they themselves are but bondsmen and slaves, "fancied freemen amid the clanking of their chains and imaginary monarchs beneath the infliction of their keepers."

WE MUST NOT INTERVENE UNLESS THERE IS A SUBVERSION OF POLITICAL INSTITUTIONS.

So far as I am concerned I am in favor of letting all the world understand what we mean by the Monroe doctrine. There ought to be no secret or mystery about it. Let me give you my definition, and I appeal to the historic evidence I have given in support of its accuracy:

First. We mean that no foreign power shall forcibly establish any monarchical government upon the face of the American continent.

Second. We mean that every republican form of government upon this hemisphere shall remain intact, subject alone to the free will of its own people.

Third. We do not and we can not mean that foreign governments within these limits shall not enforce their just demands against American nations.

Fourth. Once and forever we do not mean that we contemplate any protectorate over any other American nation.

Fifth. We can not possibly mean that when a foreign government in the enforcement of rights recognized by the law of nations subjects the revenues of one of these states to its control, it is our duty to intervene and become the guarantor of its obligations. What we do mean is that when the process reaches beyond that point and there is an attempt to subvert republican institutions, that then, under the Monroe doctrine, we will intervene and protect these states from aggression.

Sixth. We do not believe that the seizure of a custom-house, in order to obtain indemnity for a wrongful act, is a permanent invasion of territory or a subversion of republican institutions within the meaning of the Monroe doctrine, and that upon an attempt of this sort being made without any further encroachment it becomes our province to interfere by force and prevent it.

Seventh. And lastly, what is more important than all, we repudiate the doctrine that the flag follows a contract, and that we propose by war or by the menace or threat of war to enforce the performance of contractual obligations entered into by foreign governments with our own citizens.

If we abide by these maxims we will inculcate two lessons of imperishable value. In the first place, we will announce to these republics that they must pay their honest debts, that they have no right to repudiate their obligations, and that they can not involve this Government in their settlement or look to us to become the collectors and distributors of their revenue. In the second place, we will announce to our own citizens that when they enter upon transactions in these states that while we will protect their property and their liberty against wrongful invasion, so far as their contracts are concerned they are subject to the laws of the jurisdiction in which they are to be performed and that they shall not appeal to us to make good their profits, and by armed intervention insure the completion of their enterprises.

This is my ritual. This is the orthodox ritual. While I am not a devotee at the shrine of antiquity and am always willing to accept any new doctrine that may be an improvement upon the old, no matter how startling it may be, in this particular I stand by the ancient confession of faith and do not propose to become a proselyte from its altar. I believe that, however well intentioned the present purpose may be, that a financial protectorate over any of these republics will gradually lead to a political protectorate over them, and then by insidious process to annexation. Thus believing, I am unwilling to fashion the interpretation to the emergency, and standing upon a basic principle I do not propose that every zephyr that fans from the Caribbean shall sway and sweep me from the rock to which I am lashed. I do not believe that, looking at this subject calmly and practically, there is the slightest danger of any foreign government forcibly seizing the custom-houses of these states. The President's fears upon this subject will prove to be unfounded. He is generally apprehensive that we are continually in danger of war, and possessed of this belief he properly concludes that we ought to be continually making preparations for war in time of peace. I do not believe that any European or Asiatic power is anxious either to enter upon a conflict with us or with any state whose political autonomy they know that we will uphold and protect. Every government on this earth knows that we will not permit any of these republics to be subverted or deprived of their liberty or political rights. If such an attempt was made, there would be genuine war, but foreign powers have no designs of this sort and are not premeditating any such proceedings. They have sufficient troubles of their own without hazarding such a perilous undertaking. They all desire our good will and not our enmity. This whole issue is a dead issue; it has been buried so long that we ought not to drag it from its charnel house. I would suggest, with great respect, that whenever a council of adventurers and speculators notifies us that war ships are on their way to collect their debts, let us solemnly resolve that we will not become unduly agitated, but will exercise a proper degree of self-restraint and patience until the actual demonstration takes place.

A WORLD POWER.

I would like it understood that I am not opposed to this Government making proper efforts at all times through arbitrament or the intervention of its friendly offices to adjust and compromise controversies that other nations are engaged in. If this is what we mean by being a world power, I approve of it in the highest degree. Not only this, but I am in favor of advancing American interests and securing them the same rights and privileges that other nations possess in foreign lands. I have always thought the best way to accomplish this, however, was to open the highways of the ocean, so that our ports should be cleared for the commerce of mankind and so that the handiwork of the American mechanic and the fabric of the American mills could cross the sea and compete with the product of every country in every metropolis and emporium of the civilized world. Be this as it may, let it be understood that I would place no obstacle in our way as a world power, if we mean by this equal rights with every other people upon every avenue of trade and commerce and equal opportunities for American enterprise into whatever distant regions its thrift and industry may desire to venture. So far so good. But if we mean by becoming a world power that we are to take part in all the conflicts between other nations, that whenever a country is to be stolen we shall have an equal opportunity to participate in the plunder, that whenever the territory of a defenseless people is to be partitioned that we are to have a share of the booty, that whenever a national felony or deed of violence is to be committed that we are to have a hand in the pillage, that we are to have equal rights with all the other robbers who have heretofore purloined the fairest portions of the earth, that whenever a helpless State is unable to protect itself and other governments are ready to prey upon it that we must speed our battle ships to the feast and maneuver as a world power for an allotment of its possessions and a dividend of its liberties, if this is what we mean by a world power—and it looks to me as though this is what we do mean—then by whomsoever conceived and by whomsoever executed, regardless of the converts it leads to the altars of our institutions or the captives that it brings with gilded manacles into our realms, I denounce this whole crusade against human rights as a "policy that is at war with the providence of God and makes a mockery of religion's holiest offices."

CONFUSION BETWEEN THE POWER OF THE INDIVIDUAL AND THE POWER OF THE GOVERNMENT.

I am now about to conclude. In no sentiment that I have expressed have I been actuated by partisan motives. As much as I cherish the principles of my party, I could subordinate the whole of them when they conflict with the welfare of my country. The President and every officer under him to whom governmental policies have been committed have faithfully performed their functions, and they deserve all the commendation that has been accorded to them by the tribute of a united people. Every advance that we have made under their administration has with glowing emphasis, regardless of party lines, received the grateful recognition and acknowledgment of our countrymen. The whole danger that exists with us to-day is in attempting to accomplish too much and involving ourselves in cares and controversies that will only distract and complicate us. There must be a limit to our zeal and a boundary line to our aspirations. It is not necessary that every day shall dawn upon some new accomplishment.

Some years ago in this Hall the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], in an address replete with power and eloquence, gave expression to the following sentiment:

> We will not renounce our part in the mission of our race—trustee, under God, of the civilization of the world. And we will move forward to our work, not howling our regrets like slaves whipped to their burdens, but with gratitude for a task worthy of our strength, and thanksgiving to Almighty God that He has marked us as His chosen people, henceforth to lead in the regeneration of the world.

No member of this body is imbued with deeper religious convictions than I am, but I do not believe in this doctrine that we are trustees under God of the civilization of the world.

The Senator from Indiana will find no such decree as this enrolled in the chancery of heaven. When the time arrives, which I hope may be far distant, and he has passed through the eternal gates, he will search in vain for such a document as this among the archives of the celestial regions. If we are trustees, under what instrument do we hold? We are not a judicial trustee. We may, perhaps, be a constructive trustee, de son tort. One thing is sure, we are not a conventional trustee. Search the Constitution, the origin of the grant, and the Magna Charta of our title, and you fail to find in any one of its provisions a justification for the exercise of such an authority. It is just this unfortunate confusion between the power of the individual and the power of the Government that has cast upon us the onerous burdens that we now assume. This Government is not a foreign missionary society or an institution for the feeble-minded, and however commendable the efforts of individuals may be in this direction, this Government as a government has no such functions to perform. This is our whole trouble. You start from a false premise, and then you conclude that it is our duty as a trustee to march around the outposts of civilization, to patrol the waters of the world, and wherever we can find a feeble or degenerate race to claim them as our cestuis que trust, to appropriate their possessions and then, jure divino, as the chosen people of God, impose upon them our sovereignty. My heart goes out with thrilling love and sympathy for all those self-sacrificing souls who are spreading the solace and comforts of religion in foreign lands, who, courting danger and affliction, have gathered around the emblems of their faith the forsaken children of mankind, and upon every path of human suffering have ministered to the agonies of despair; but I can never acquiesce in the proposition that this is a governmental function, and that it is our duty to deprive a single race on earth, no matter how depraved and degenerate it may be, either in the interest of religion or civilization, of the slightest fragment of its possessions or the slightest vestige of its liberty.

I am with the slave in every darkened corner of the globe where he is struggling to be free, and I hope the day will come when every government that is built upon the bowed bodies of its subjects may disintegrate, and that upon its ruins republican institutions may arise. Let me say to you, however, Mr. President, as deeply as I love my country, with all the devotion I would lay upon her altars, with a fervid reverence for her flag wherever its colors greet the eye, I would rather see that flag lowered and trampled upon than used as a pirate's ensign and raised, not as an emblem of honor, but as an instrument of terror and oppression to the helpless and enfeebled races of mankind.

During the delivery of Mr. RAYNER'S speech,

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). The Senator from Maryland will suspend for a moment. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 529) to promote the national defense, to create a force of naval volunteers, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue for tonnage.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be laid aside until the Senator from Maryland completes his remarks.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I have some concern about the resolution that is at the head of what was submitted by the Senator from Maryland, and had expected to say a few words upon it. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will agree that the resolution, after the Senator from Maryland finishes, shall go over until such time as I may be able to call it up. I have to leave the city on an important mission and go to South Carolina, and there will not be any chance for me to get in to-day.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that that course will be entirely agreeable to me personally.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to make a request to the Senate that the resolution shall lie on the table and be called up at a subsequent day. I dare say there will be other Senators who will wish to be heard.

Undoubtedly this interpretation, this eloquent indictment of the Roosevelt doctrine, I will call it, will not go unchallenged by our friends on the other side; and I wish to add a little additional reason why it should not go unchallenged. I hope that the request may be in the form which I present, that the resolution, upon the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Maryland, shall go over and may be called up at a subsequent day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the Chair will state the request of the Senator from New Hampshire to be that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside until the Senator from Maryland has concluded, and the Senator from South Carolina requests that the resolution may lie on the table.

Mr. TILLMAN. That it may go back on the table to be subject to call at any future day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That it lie on the table subject to the Senator's call at any future day.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none and it is so ordered.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

After the conclusion of Mr. RAYNER'S speech,

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask that the unfinished business may be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being Senate bill No. 529.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 529) to promote the national defense, to create a force of naval volunteers, to establish American ocean mail lines to foreign markets, to promote commerce, and to provide revenue from tonnage.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in his last memorable speech at Buffalo, proclaiming the need of broader markets and a greater foreign commerce, the late President McKinley thus outlined one of the indispensable methods by which that expanded foreign trade must be obtained:

> Then, too, we have inadequate steamship service. New lines of steamers have already been put in commission between the Pacific coast ports of the United States and those on the western coast of Mexico and South and Central America. These should be followed up with direct steamship lines between the eastern coast of the United States and South American ports. One of the needs of the times is direct commercial lines from our vast fields of production to the fields of consumption that we have but barely touched.
> Next in advantage to having the thing to sell is to have the convenience to carry it to the buyer. We must encourage our merchant marine. We must have more ships. They must be under the American flag, built and manned and owned by Americans. These will not only be profitable in a commercial sense, they will be messengers of peace and amity wherever they go.

Since that time President Roosevelt has on three different occasions called the attention of Congress to this matter. In his annual message of December 7, 1903, he recommended the appointment of a commission to investigate the subject of the merchant marine, with a view to appropriate legislation. Congress responded to that suggestion, and appointed a joint Commission of the two bodies, which Commission made an exhaustive investigation, their conclusions being embodied in two elaborate printed reports, and the bill now under consideration was also prepared by that Commission.

In his latest message to Congress, on the 5th day of December last, President Roosevelt said:

> To the spread of our trade in peace and the defense of our flag in war a great and prosperous merchant marine is indispensable. We should have ships of our own and seamen of our own to convey our goods to neutral markets, and in case of need to reenforce our battle line. It can not but be a source of regret and uneasiness to us that the lines of communication with our sister Republics of South America should be chiefly under foreign control. It is not a good thing that American merchants and manufacturers should have to send their goods and letters to South America via Europe if they wish security and dispatch. Even on the Pacific, where our ships have held their own better than on the Atlantic, our merchant flag is now threatened through the liberal aid bestowed by other governments on their own steam lines. I ask your earnest consideration of the report with which the Merchant Marine Commission has followed its long and careful inquiry.

The practical question now before us is, Will Congress heed the admonitions of Presidents McKinley and Roosevelt, or will it continue to neglect this most important industry until the remnant of our once prosperous merchant marine is driven from the seas?

To-day alone of all the nations ambitious for mercantile expansion the United States neglects its ocean shipping. Our coast fleets and our lake fleets, protected by ancient Federal statutes absolutely excluding foreign vessels from domestic traffic, are the most efficient, prosperous, and progressive in the world, as they are also incomparably the greatest in their aggregate tonnage. These domestic fleets are superb proof of American genius for the industry of water-borne transportation. Taking the coast and lake ships and the river boats together, we have a merchant navy of 5,335,000 tons, or six times the size of the poor, shrunken fleet of 888,000 tons registered for foreign commerce, which ought naturally to be now what it long was—by far the greater and richer portion of our whole mercantile marine instead of a starving and lessening fragment.

THE WORST RESULT OF OUR LACK OF SHIPS.

The decline of our ocean tonnage is a melancholy story. There is no need to rehearse it now. The Merchant Marine Commission in the whole course of its investigation sought to deal rather with the present and the future, and to regard the past only for what light it could shed on the work in hand—the imperative task of rehabilitation. Sad as is the long decay of our deep-sea shipping—once the proudest in the world—the gradual disappearance of our shipyards, the bankruptcy of our ship merchants, the loss of our skilled mechanics and seamen, this, after all, though a calamity and a great one, is far less serious for the present, less portentous for the future, than the cramping and withering effect of our lack of American ships on the export trade of the United States. William McKinley's prophetic vision, in that final address of his to his fellow-countrymen, saw that without ships of our own to convey our goods to our customers we should be more and more hopelessly handicapped against our maritime competitors in the neutral markets of the world.

NO MERCHANT WOULD RISK IT.

To take a familiar but just illustration, What department store in any American city, engaged in a sharp contest for business, would dream of intrusting to a rival store the delivery of its goods to its customers? Is it not a fundamental principle of such keen competitive business—with which the rivalry of America and Europe in international commerce may not inaptly be compared—is it not the prime instinct of every successful merchant in such business to maintain an active and comprehensive delivery service of his own? Would any merchant conducting such a store sell or lay up his own wagons and neglect to provide others, even if his competitor offered to do the work more cheaply? It would be a poor judge of human nature, indeed, who would consent to such a proposition. His fellow merchants, partners, or assignees in the bankruptcy proceedings, that would certainly ensue, would have grave question of his sanity.

Yet the stupid merchant who turns his delivery service over to his rivals rather than be bothered with it himself has one conspicuous exemplar among the nations in the person of the United States. There are two other commercial nations of inferior rank which have also won an unenviable reputation for neglect of their delivery service—of their merchant shipping facilities. One of these two nations is China, the other is Russia. The fact speaks for itself with sufficient eloquence.

THE EXAMPLE OF OUR COMPETITORS.

But neither Russia nor China is the real rival of America. Our formidable competitors are the island kingdom of Great Britain and the two continental nations that front, the one on the North Sea, the other on the Bay of Biscay. What Great Britain, Germany, and France have done and are doing is of very live significance to the United States.

In the first place, all through the years when the world's ships were built of wood, and, service considered, built most cheaply in America, Great Britain rigidly denied registry to all vessels launched outside the United Kingdom. This was not altered to a so-called "free-ship" policy until it had become manifest that iron was destined to supplant wood as the material for ship construction, and that in constructing iron ships Great Britain had marked advantages over America. The free-ship legislation of Parliament, in 1849, was virtually nullified until 1854 by Lloyd's discriminations against American-built vessels. Here is one example of the historic British determination to have British commerce conveyed in British ships—a determination which, ever since Cromwell's time, had molded all the ingeniously and savagely protective navigation laws of the British Government.

EARLY BRITISH SUBSIDIES.

In 1840 the first regular line of British trans-Atlantic steamships—now the celebrated Cunard Line—was established, with an annual subsidy of several hundred thousand dollars. At that time, and for years before, the entire trans-Atlantic packet service in sail ships was conducted in American ships by American merchants. This packet service was the direct outgrowth of our own navigation laws, with their discriminating duties and tonnage dues, initiated in 1789 by Washington, Madison, and Jefferson. British competition with our packet lines, often attempted, had always proved impossible.

But in steam engines, and subsequently in iron hulls, Great Britain saw her opportunity, and was quick to improve it. Her subsidized steam line in turn began to drive our sailing packets off the ocean. The United States, under the initiative of President Polk and by vote of a Democratic Congress, met this attack by the offer of generous mail subsidies to American trans-Atlantic steam lines, of which the Collins line became the most famous and successful. The new American steamers were larger and faster than the Cunard ships, and soon possessed themselves of the lion's share of the trans-Atlantic commerce. Great Britain was now paying large sums of money for the transportation of her mails in exclusively British steamers, which were being regularly beaten by the Americans. This was maritime protectionism carried to an extreme, but on the ocean the British Government never wavered. Mr. Cobden, Mr. Gladstone, and the other statesmen who were now proclaiming on land the transcendent virtues of free trade nevertheless continued to vote lavish subsidies to the inferior Cunard ships that but for the subsidies would have been straightway driven off the passage.

Not only were these subsidies continued, but after a time they were very heavily increased, in a hope of securing improved speed. What the end of this rivalry would have been if the United States had held on can only be conjectured; but the unhappy feud between the North and South in Congress led to the canceling of the mail subsidies in 1858, at the very crisis of the contest between American and British shipowners. Not only the Collins but the other American companies were killed by this act, and for thirty years after 1861 the British flag retained undisputed mastery of the North Atlantic.

THE BRITISH PURPOSE.

That the British statesmen of 1840 to 1861 held President McKinley's view of the intimate relations of a country's ships to that country's commerce is demonstrated in this significant extract from the report of the parliamentary committee on contract packets in 1853:

> The objects which appear to have led to the formation of these contracts, and to the larger expenditures involved, were to afford us rapid, frequent, and punctual communication with distant ports which feed the main arteries of British commerce, and with the most important of our foreign possessions, to foster maritime enterprise and to encourage the production of a superior class of vessels, which would promote the convenience and wealth of the country in time of peace and assist in defending its shores against hostile aggression.

Indeed, British appreciation of the commercial maxim that "trade follows the flag" was so keen and thorough that a generous subsidy was granted for the creation of a British steamship line along the west coast of South America that touched at no British port whatever. Lindsay, the historian of British merchant shipping, says of the motives that prompted this significant action:

> The extension of British influence and British commerce was doubtless the chief inducement for supporting this communication between the Republics of New Grenada, Bolivia, Peru, and Chile, the nature and extent of that traffic rendering it necessary for the English to maintain mercantile establishments in the chief ports and towns of the western coast of the Pacific, and thus justifying the Government in incurring this expense. (W. S. Lindsay, History of Merchant Shipping, Vol. IV, p. 317.)

THE WORK OF AN AMERICAN.

This British steamship line in the Southern Pacific, thus started, is in existence to-day as the Pacific Steam Navigation Company. This company and the British "mercantile establishments" connected with it are an important, and probably the most potent, factor in the supremacy which Great Britain has held and now holds in Chile and the neighboring countries of South America. It is one of the ironies of fate that the actual founding of this powerful British steam line was the work of an American, a New England merchant, Mr. William Wheelwright, United States consul at Guayaquil, who first sought to interest his own Government in the project of an American steamship service on the west coast of South America; but he was rebuffed at Washington, and denied all help and encouragement. Not until then did he go to England. Parliament promptly granted the necessary subsidy, but required, of course, that the steamships not only should fly the British colors, but should be British-built—although Mr. Wheelwright was authorized to use the successful American model and arrangement.

Besides this British steamship line, that traversed a course where not one port was British, Parliament, by a generous subsidy of $1,200,000 yearly, created a British steam line to the West Indies, the Isthmus of Panama, Brazil, and Argentina. This was half a century ago; the Royal Mail service, with its business firmly established, has had its subsidy of late years reduced to about $400,000. So effective has been this British maritime protectionism that in the ports not only of Chile, but of Bolivia, Peru, Argentina, and Brazil the Stars and Stripes flying over an American merchant steamer are now never seen, while British commerce, which these subsidies were given to promote, far surpasses ours in every one of these Latin-American republics.

GERMANY'S STEAMSHIP LINES.

The one Old World nation which has made prodigious strides in foreign commerce of recent years, our ever vigilant and most formidable competitor, is the Empire of Germany, a thoroughly protectionist nation like our own. Until a quarter of a century ago, German sea power was absolutely insignificant. The Empire had a small war navy and a small and not very prosperous or efficient merchant fleet. The chief German ships, both of war and of commerce, were British built. In 1881–82, when the Rhaetia and Rugia of 3,500 tons were launched for the Hamburg-American Company, not more than three or four small steamers of the deep-sea type had ever been constructed in German yards. A "free-ship" policy was in force, under which German shipowners bought nearly all of their ocean tonnage in England, Scotland, or America. But it is significant that under this "free-ship" policy, long and patiently tried, there had come no real growth in the German marine. German tonnage, like French tonnage under a similar trial of the "free-ship" policy, remained almost at a standstill. The Bureau Veritas records give Germany a merchant shipping of 1,098,000 tons in 1873, and of 1,277,000 tons in 1881. In Germany as in France, free ships, tested alone without national aid and encouragement, had utterly failed to bring any substantial increase in the commerce-creating power of the national marine.

In 1881, France, dismayed at the results of a "free-ship" policy, turned to subsidies and bounties in a belated and desperate effort to save her shipbuilding and navigation. The German statesmen at the same time resolved to do the same thing. Bismarck himself, then at the zenith of his fame and power, addressed an urgent memorial to the German Parliament, invoking attention to the French example, and also pointing to the splendid results to British trade and shipping that had followed the long-continued and generous British policy of subsidizing ocean mail lines to the chief markets of the world.

Bismarck argued that Germany was no longer merely an agricultural, but was becoming a manufacturing and commercial nation; that such a nation must inevitably seek new outlets for the surplus products of its industry; that it could never hope to gain a fair share of the world's commerce so long as it depended on the ships of its foreign rivals for the means of delivering its own merchandise to neutral customers. The great German statesman called upon the legislators to provide immediately national encouragement to German steamship lines, so that German manufacturers and merchants could have a fair chance to send their goods to foreign lands, without relying upon foreign steamships owned and run in the interests of their British or French competitors.

There were at that time long-established British and French steamship lines to Asia, Africa, and South America, with connections that enabled them to handle German merchandise. But the far-seeing Bismarck was not content with this. He knew that when German goods were landed at their foreign destination the British or French agents of the steamship companies that handled them were not interested in increasing German sales or advancing German trade, but were very much interested in promoting the commerce of their own countries. Under such circumstances, Bismarck argued, there could of course be no fair play for German goods, and no hope of a very large increase in the commerce of the Empire.

Germany in 1885 had, under its protective system, so developed its manufacturing resources that, like the United States in 1905, it found the need of a foreign outlet more and more imperative. Bismarck's plea for German ships to deliver German goods to foreign customers won from the Reichstag a law granting a mail subvention of 4,400,000 marks ($1,047,500) a year for fifteen years for a German steamship service to China, Japan, and Australia. That the chief motive of this subvention was to promote commerce rather than to secure swift auxiliary cruisers, or even to facilitate the mails, is shown by the fact that the required speed was only 11½ to 13 knots an hour. The service was undertaken by the North German Lloyd Steamship Company, of Bremen, and the first steamer sailed for the East in June, 1886.

Hitherto German shipowners, under a "free ship" policy, which discouraged German shipbuilding, had procured abroad most of their vessels—including all the largest and best of their ocean-going fleet. Now, however, there came a significant new departure. The German Government required that, in order to receive this mail subvention, the steamships performing the service should be built in German yards, by German workmen, and, as far as possible, of German materials. In other words, so far as this new German steamship fleet was concerned, the free ship policy that had been tried and proved disappointing, was abandoned.

THE GAIN OF GERMAN TRADE.

When the mail subvention was granted and the new German steamships put to sea the Empire had very little trade with Australasia and the Orient. This distant commerce had long been regarded as a British or a French monopoly, and the pioneer German liners went out with almost empty holds. Without Government aid the new steamship service never could have been started, or, if started, it could not have lived a year. Indeed, the total receipts of the German East India service were 7,920,000 marks for 1887, exclusive of the subvention of 4,400,000 marks, while the expenses were 12,823,000 marks—so that the service almost showed a deficit, even with the Government assistance. But year after year there came a gradual improvement. Cargoes and passengers both increased until eventually the service was on a profitable basis.

The important fact, however, is not that the steamship company finally earned dividends, but that this mail subvention of 4,400,000 marks a year, creating a new line of German steamers, finally brought a greatly increased commerce to the German people.

In 1888, two years after the East India service started, the exports of merchandise by these German ships were in quantity 27,369 tons, and in value 33,190,000 marks. By 1896 these exports had increased to 89,148 tons, valued at 74,433,000 marks. A mail subvention of 4,400,000 marks a year had brought an increased export trade of more than 50,000,000 marks to the German Empire, and this was only the beginning of German expansion in the markets of the Orient.

ANOTHER GERMAN SUCCESS.

So successful did the East India mail subvention prove, in expanding German commerce with China, Japan, and Australia, that in 1890 the Reichstag granted another subvention to create a German steam line to East Africa. There was no pretense that this was necessary for postal purposes, for the German mails were conveyed rapidly to African ports by long-established British and French steamers, which were also available to carry German merchandise. The subvention was offered frankly to increase German trade and German influence.

The East Africa service was a shorter route, and at first only small vessels were required. The subvention therefore was set at 900,000 marks ($214,000) a year, and the ships employed were smaller and less powerful than the ordinary coast craft of the United States. But they went out direct from Germany—there was no transshipment of freight; they bore the German flag; they were officered and manned by loyal Teuton sailors, and the agents of the steamship company in the East African ports were German merchants, with everything at stake in increasing the sales of German merchandise. As a natural result, German commerce with East Africa grew so rapidly that the German steamship receipts from freight and passengers advanced from 453,000 marks, or only a little more than twice the subvention in 1892, to 1,476,000 marks, or seven times the subvention in 1898.

This swift and great expansion of German trade, under the impulse of generous mail subventions to German steamships, offers a significant contrast with our own stand-still commerce in those South American countries where all the ocean-going ships fly European flags and are controlled by European interests.

Experience with the mail subvention as a means of fostering German commerce so thoroughly satisfied the German Government and people that in 1898 and 1899 the Reichstag directed the renewal of both the Asiatic and the African mail contracts for another fifteen-year period—increasing the former compensation from 4,400,000 to 5,590,000 marks, and the latter from 900,000 to 1,350,000 marks, and requiring at the same time an improved and extended service. But no "greyhound" speed was exacted of these German steamers. The moderate rate of about 13 knots on the Asiatic and from 10½ to 12 knots on the African line was regarded as sufficient for German commercial purposes.

STILL OTHER GERMAN AIDS.

These imperial mail subventions are by no means the only method by which the German Government encourages shipping in order to expand German commerce. Shipyard materials are hauled at a nominal figure on the German State railways—a virtual bounty on shipbuilding. These State railways also transport at a very low rate merchandise intended for export by German steamers. British merchants complain that this German railway policy is throwing more and more of the Far Eastern carrying trade into German ships, to the severe injury of London and Hull and Plymouth and Liverpool. Moreover, all the mighty influence of the Imperial Government is constantly exerted to applaud and honor all those who are connected with the building up of German shipping and the expansion of German commerce—an agency which, says Consul-General Mason at Berlin, "in a country like this where royal favor is so potent and eagerly sought for is an important element of success."

Not until Germany began to own and build her own ships to carry her own trade did she begin to be considered as a serious factor in the commerce of the world. Her wonderful maritime expansion has made her mercantile expansion possible. The clear vision of the great Bismarck first recognized that his country must have ships in order to have commerce, and that to have ships meant increased prosperity not only for the seaport towns, but for every manufacturing village or agricultural district producing anything that could be sold abroad. German merchant tonnage that under a "free-ship" policy, without State aid, increased only from 1,098,000 in 1873 to 1,277,000 in 1881, has, with State aid, grown to 3,393,000 in 1904, and German commerce has expanded in almost like proportion.

FRANCE DRIVEN TO SUBSIDY.

France, like Germany, long and patiently tried the "free-ship" policy for the ostensible benefit of her shipping and commerce. She adopted this policy in 1866. In 1872–73, dismayed by the results of "free ships," France resorted for a short time to discriminating duties, but was forced to abandon them because of the threatened retaliation of other nations, the United States included. "Free ships" were then renewed. In 1870 France had a merchant tonnage of 1,072,000; in 1881, after a long experiment with "free ships," French tonnage had fallen to 914,000, while French shipbuilding, overwhelmed by British competition, was so nearly dead that it was a difficult problem to keep up the construction of the navy.

After this illuminating experience the French Government, in 1881, offered an elaborate system of bounties for shipbuilding and subsidies for navigation, applying to the entire ocean-going merchant fleet of France. The system was experimental. It was successful from the first in encouraging French navigation—the proportion of long-voyage traffic under the French flag increasing from 28 per cent in 1880 to 39 per cent in 1890. Outside of the postal lines, France in 1881 had only two lines of ocean steamships. But by 1890, under the effect of the navigation subsidies, France had five lines to Brazil and Argentina (the United States now has not one), three lines to New York, three to Senegal, and two to the west coast of Africa, and one line each to Cochin China, Chile, Madagascar, New Orleans, the West Indies, Mexico, and the Isthmus of Panama. At first the effect on French shipbuilding was disappointing, and an excessive subsidy to sail craft led to an abnormal increase of French sail tonnage at the expense of steam. However, in successive revisions of the French subsidy law these defects, that had provoked severe criticism, were amended, until of recent years there has been a large and reasonably steady growth in the entire French marine. French steam tonnage, which was 805,000 (gross) in 1890, had gained to 1,266,000 in 1904, while French sail tonnage had increased from 298,000 (net) to 494,000.

FOREIGN METHODS AND OUR OWN.

The real backbone of the French merchant marine is composed of the two great ocean mail companies, the Compagnie Générale Transatlantique and the Messageries Maritimes, the latter giving French merchants postal and freight communication with the Orient. Each of these two great companies has long received mail subventions of from $1,500,000 to $2,000,000 a year, and that their influence in building up French trade has been potent is demonstrated by the fact that Bismarck pointed to the French lines especially as proof that Germany must follow the French example or give up all hope of securing a fair share of the commerce of the world.

Germany now pays an annual subvention of $1,330,000 to the North German Lloyd for a steamship service to China, Japan, and Australia. Great Britain pays $1,600,000 to the Peninsular and Oriental for a steamship service to the Orient. France, as has been said, gives to each of her two great companies a mail subvention of from $1,500,000 to $2,000,000 a year. The United States in the fiscal year 1904 paid in mail subventions to all the lines under the American flag (including $690,000 to the American line to Europe) only $1,375,000, or but a little more than the German Pacific line received, and much less than Great Britain and France gave to a single one of their great steamship companies.

THE COST OF OUR NEGLECT.

It is manifest that this niggardly policy on the part of the United States not only discourages American shipowning and shipbuilding, but—far more important—hampers the efforts of American manufacturers, farmers, and merchants to gain their rightful share of the world's commerce. These great ocean mail lines of the powers of Europe all run direct from their own ports to the ports of the other continents. These powers spend no subsidies on lines from the United States. The European ships that engage in American trade with South America, Africa, and the Orient are as a rule poor, slow, inefficient, uneconomical craft—the cast-off "tramps" of European services. They are owned and managed by foreign companies, whose first concern is for the welfare of their own nation and for the profit of their main lines of communication. As the president of the British Peninsular and Oriental, in a recent address boasted:

> Our policy is that of a British company which is keenly alive to British interests, and I believe in this respect we represent the general feeling of the shipowners of the country.

European shipowners are frankly working to keep their own country's trade as great, and the trade of the United States as small, as possible. To leave to men like these the ocean transportation service of America is, to quote Thomas Jefferson, a "strange speculation," which, if long continued, would mark the United States as a simpleton among the nations.

FOR BROAD NATIONAL INTERESTS.

The plea of the Merchant Marine Commission, indorsed by the Committee on Commerce of this body, is not primarily for the shipowners or shipbuilders, or even for the seamen of this country, though all of these three classes deserve at least as much consideration as is granted by our national laws to any other industrious and patriotic body of American citizens. The need of a large, active and prosperous merchant fleet is primarily to increase our commerce, next to promote the national defense, and last of all to encourage shipbuilding and navigation. To deny adequate consideration to the merchant marine is to cheat the western or southern farmer of one of the surest hopes of an increased market for the products of his industry. It is to cheat the merchant and manufacturer of an indispensable ally in their fight for trade with their powerful European competitors.

Britain, France, and Germany all make generous provision by national subvention for conveying not only their mails but their merchandise under their national flags to the distant neutral markets in which they and we are contending for the commercial mastery. Even the smaller powers—Spain, Italy, Austria, Portugal, and last, but not least, Japan—do the same thing. The United States alone leaves its merchants, manufacturers, and farmers at the edge of the ocean to get their goods over seas as best they may—by some accident of trade or the grace of their foreign rivals. If we lag in the world's markets, if we fall behind even in the Philippines, our own possessions, if we see Germany striding ahead of us in the Orient, and all Europe grasping South America by commercial bonds stronger than the Monroe Doctrine, the fault is our own, and in our own hands lies the remedy.

"IF FOREIGNERS WILL DO THIS WORK FOR US MORE CHEAPLY THAN WE CAN DO IT OURSELVES, WHY NOT LET THEM?"

One of the most frequent and plausible objections urged to a policy of national encouragement to the merchant marine is found in this question, "If foreigners will do this work for us more cheaply than we can do it ourselves, why not let them?" Critically examined, however, it is nothing but the fundamental free-trade argument in the most extreme form in which it is possible to state it. Many years ago this very same plausible argument was familiar in another field—"If England, France, and other countries can make our cotton and woolen fabrics, our tools, and our iron more cheaply than we can, why not let them do so—why not let Europe be the workshop and America the farm?" Of course Europe enthusiastically favored this idea; and Washington, Hamilton, Madison, and other far-seeing statesmen who framed in 1789 our first tariff law "for the encouragement and protection of manufactures" had considerable difficulty in convincing their countrymen of the fallacy of this adroit plea, which foreign interests now exploit in turn against the encouragement of American shipping.

If the argument were admitted as a sound one, that if foreigners will do or make anything for us more cheaply than our own people, they ought to be permitted to do so, then the entire protective system of the United States is rooted in a delusion, and ought to be abandoned, root and branch. To admit that this argument is sound is to admit the whole free-trade contention, pure and simple.

APPLY THIS TO THE FARMERS.

This adroit argument of those who are opposed to national aid for American shipping depends for its force very largely on the class of men before whom it is used, or the latitude or longitude in which it is promulgated. To say, "If foreigners can do our ocean carrying more cheaply than we can, why not let them do it?" sounds very persuasive to the farmer of either Massachusetts or Minnesota, who is not himself particularly interested in shipbuilding or shipowning. But put this same argument in another form to the Massachusetts farmer: "If the Canadians can supply eggs and butter and hay and potatoes more cheaply than you can, why not tear down the tariff wall and let them do so?" or to the Minnesota farmer: "If Manitoba can raise wheat for the American market more cheaply than you can, why not repeal the protective duty of 25 cents per bushel and let Manitoba raise our wheat while you sell out and go to work for somebody else?"—the public man who propounded this question in either Massachusetts or Minnesota would find himself a quick candidate for retirement.

Yet, if the farmers, East and West, expect and demand national encouragement for their industry through the Department of Agriculture, through irrigation, and in many ways, as well as through the tariff, why should not the shipowner and the seaman in the deep-sea trade have some encouragement also? Why should protection be applied to the one class, and free trade to the other? Where is the equity of taking an immigrant fresh from Germany or Scandinavia, setting him on a western farm, irrigated at the national expense, and giving this same immigrant generous protection on his cereals or his fruits, while all protection is denied to an American-born shipowner or seaman whose ancestors fought under Paul Jones, or Decatur, or Hull, or who himself fought under Farragut, or Porter, or Dewey, or Sampson, or Schley?

If protection is wise and right for the one, why is it not wise and right for the other?

BUILT UNDER PROTECTION.

The American shipowner or seaman is compelled to build and equip his ship in a protected country, to pay protected wages, and to buy protected materials—for, though steel and other things for ships for the deep sea as distinguished from the coast trade are on the free list, nobody dares to avail himself of the privilege so long as there is no encouragement or protection in the deep-sea business. The wages on the ship after she is built are fixed, generally, by the protected wages prevailing in America. Moreover, many foreign ships in our own commerce receive subsidies or bounties, and nearly all are protected and encouraged, if not in this, in some other more subtle but effective way by their own governments.

In the face of all this, to accept the free-trade argument for the shipowner and seaman alone, and to say to them, "Here, if the foreigners can do your trade of ocean carrying more cheaply than you can, we'll let them do so—you can sell out and go to work for somebody else" is an injustice so harsh that the farmers, East, South, and West, need only to understand it to reject it at once and forever. If, in addition to the natural advantage of the cheap and fertile lands of Manitoba, the Canadian government gave a bounty of 25 cents a bushel on all the wheat there produced, it is easy to foresee what would soon become of the wheat raisers of the Dakotas and Minnesota. Yet, if the argument is a sound one that whatever foreigners can, by subsidy or otherwise, do more cheaply than we can, they ought to be allowed to do it, who will gainsay the shipowner or seaman who declares: "Here I am, unprotected in my ocean trade. Why should the farmer be protected? If Canada can raise cheaper wheat for New York and New England, pull down the tariff and let her do so. What right have you to deny protection to me, and at the same time forbid me to go with my ship for my wheat to British Columbia if I can get it cheaper there, or to Nova Scotia for my potatoes, or to Argentina for my beef, or wool, or hides?"

And what answer is there, truly? Is protection justifiable that protects some only, and not all?

CHEAPER IN THE LONG RUN.

Moreover, it is worth considering whether, even if it is true that foreigners can now do our ocean carrying more cheaply than we, it would be true some years hence if this our one unprotected industry were adequately and firmly protected and encouraged. Many, many years ago, when this same plea that the foreigners could do the work more cheaply than we could was being used against the efforts of Washington and his colleagues to develop American manufactures, it was also true that foreigners—the English—could, and were doing, our ocean carrying trade more cheaply. In 1789 the American merchant fleet in overseas commerce registered only 123,000 tons, and all but 23 per cent of our own imports and exports were conveyed by foreigners. There were those then, as there are now, who, for self-interest or other reasons, insisted that if the English could carry our goods more cheaply they ought to be permitted to continue to do so, regardless of its effect not only on American ship building and owning, but on the national defence. However, Washington, Adams, Hamilton, Jefferson, Madison, and the other great men of the Government took another and a broader view, and in their protective legislation included our shipowners, seamen, and fishermen—the fishermen by direct bounties, the others by the requirement that goods imported in American ships should come in at a lower rate of duty, and that their tonnage taxes should be less than were charged to their foreign competitors. This policy proved splendidly successful.

In 1789, as has been said, our registered merchant fleet consisted of only 123,000 tons, conveying 23 per cent of our commerce. In 1800 our merchant shipping had risen to 667,000 tons, conveying 89 per cent of our commerce, which, meanwhile, had very heavily increased. In 1810 our registered shipping stood at 981,000 tons, or actually 100,000 tons greater than our registered fleet of 1904.

THE LESSON OF EXPERIENCE.

Washington and his associates believed that in the course of time American ships, protected and encouraged, would be enabled to carry our goods even more cheaply than foreigners, and this confidence was perfectly justified by the result. American wages on shipboard and in the shipyards were higher as a rule than foreign wages, though the difference was not so great as now. American timber was cheaper than English, though not cheaper than north European timber, yet the materials, then as now, were a minor factor in the cost of ship construction. As the shipping business throve under national protection in the years from 1789 to 1830 and onward, American ships, built in great numbers, the product of a firm, thoroughly organized, and prosperous industry, gradually became the cheapest, because the most efficient carriers in the world. It was a common remark that an American vessel, managed by a sagacious, enterprising merchant and hard driven by skillful, well-paid officers and crew, could make four or five voyages while an English or Dutch vessel was making three. So well and so cheaply did American ships convey commerce that in the heyday of the Atlantic packets, before 1840, every packet line between our ports and Europe flew the United States flag—in eloquent contrast to present conditions, when only one of the scores of trans-Atlantic steam lines is American.

Washington's faith, therefore, that with proper encouragement his own country's ships and seamen would be doing our carrying trade and doing it more cheaply, was abundantly justified long before the first subsidized Cunard steamship crossed the ocean, in 1840. Meanwhile, the system of ship-protection by discriminating duty and tonnage dues had been steadily reduced as our shipping grew and prospered, though this system was not entirely abandoned against Britain, our chief competitor, until 1849. At that time, it was believed that American maritime supremacy was thoroughly established. In 1855 we had a registered tonnage of 2,348,000, which conveyed 75 per cent of our foreign commerce besides much of that of other nations. But for the change from wood to iron and from steam to sail, the application of generous steamship subsidies, first by England and then by continental Europe, and the outbreak of our Civil War, the United States, with its unrivalled native aptitude for the sea, would undoubtedly have remained a great ocean carrier. But these unforeseen events undid the work which Washington and his fellow-statesmen had so wisely initiated.

However, our national experience from 1789 to 1860 proved that adequate protection to American shipping meant in the long run not only as cheap but cheaper ocean carrying than foreign nations were providing. The presumption, therefore, is a reasonable one, that though foreigners may now carry our goods more cheaply than we can, just as they did in 1789, yet American shipping, properly encouraged and strengthened, will before very long be able to do the work more cheaply as well as more efficiently than the foreigners.

THE EXAMPLE OF THE GREAT LAKES.

This reasonable presumption is fortified by a striking development which has occurred in recent years on the Great Lakes of America. Here, by the joint operation of National laws and natural causes, American shipowners have been given not mere protection and encouragement but absolute monopoly. Our coastwise statutes forbid foreign ships to convey either freight or passengers from one American port to another, and most of the Great Lakes' commerce is American in origin and destination. Moreover, only relatively small vessels, inadequate for the present carrying of bulk cargoes, can pass from the ocean into the Lakes via the St. Lawrence canals. Practically the whole evolution of Lake traffic has, therefore, been worked out by Americans, with foreign competition excluded. The result is exceedingly important and instructive. In 1886 it cost 3.68 cents a bushel to carry wheat from Chicago to Buffalo, and 62 cents a ton to carry coal from Buffalo to Duluth. In 1904 that had been reduced to 1.32 and 34 cents, respectively. Nowhere in the world is water transporation now so cheap, work considered, as on the Great Lakes, and nowhere has there been such a steady and marked reduction in the cost of the service.

JUST A FAIR CHANCE.

What is true of the steady reduction of cost in the lake trade is true also of the coastwise trade of the Atlantic and Pacific, from which the competition of foreign vessels is altogether excluded. National aid to the deep-sea carrying trade of the United States does not mean a monopoly for American ships; it means simply the putting of American ships on an equality, to start with, with foreign ships, trusting to the ingenuity and enterprise of our people and their native genius for the sea to work constantly toward an ever-decreasing cost of ocean transportation and an ever-increasing efficiency. But a century of economic experience proves beyond dispute that the Government must help its own people to begin—that in not one industry exposed to international competition and controlled at first by foreigners has America been able to make any headway whatsoever without some national assistance and encouragement. In many such industries it is now indisputable that after a reasonable time our own people have managed to do the work as cheaply as, or more cheaply, than the foreigners.

OF TRUE NATIONAL BENEFIT.

In such instances, of course, all or most of the money previously sent abroad for the products of an industry is now retained in the United States, furnishing a new market for American materials and labor. It is estimated that the annual cost of transporting the imports and exports, the mails and the passengers in the over-seas trade of this country is about $200,000,000, nine-tenths of which goes to the ships of foreign nations. If even so much as one-half of this immense yearly expenditure could be transferred to our own ships and seamen, the number of those ships and seamen would have to be multiplied five-fold—benefiting directly not only the shipbuilding and shipowning States, but all the States that furnish the timber, steel, and other materials entering into ship construction, and creating an important new market for the product of American farms. The lumbermen of Michigan, Wisconsin, Georgia, Florida, and the Carolinas, the iron miners of Wisconsin and Minnesota, and the coal miners of Pennsylvania, Illinois, Maryland, West Virginia, and Alabama would have more work and more wages if the great ships that convey our deep-sea commerce were built of American material, wrought together in American yards. The real "raw material" of a ship is the tree in the forest or the ore in the ground. At least 99 per cent of the total cost of that ship represents employment given to labor in the mines, the forests, the lumber mills, and the steel mills or foundries, as well as in the coast town where all these things are assembled in the finished vessel.

The free-trade argument involved in the plausible question, "If foreigners can build and sail our ships more cheaply, why not let them do so?" ignores these considerations altogether.

NEEDED FOR NATIONAL DEFENSE.

But there is still another consideration, and, perhaps, the most significant of all, which makes it wise for the United States to have an ocean shipping of its own—the need of ships and seamen for the national defense. This proposition is as true to-day as it was in 1794, when Thomas Jefferson, Secretary of State, wrote in behalf of the new national policy of aiding and encouraging the merchant marine. Jefferson said:

> To force shipbuilding is to establish shipyards, is to form magazines, to multiply useful hands, to produce artists and workmen of every kind, who may be found at once for the peaceful speculations of commerce and the terrible wants of war. * * * For a navigating people to purchase its marine afloat would be a strange speculation, as the marine would always be dependent on the merchants furnishing them. Placing, as a reserve, with a foreign nation or in a foreign shipyard the carpenters, blacksmiths, calkers, sailmakers, and the vessels of a nation would be a singular commercial combination. We must, therefore, build them for ourselves.

In Jefferson's time ships of war and of commerce were of wood. Their construction was relatively simple, and the means to build them were not difficult to improvise. But now, when all ships of war, as well as all large ships of commerce, are of steel, of huge size and weight, equipped with elaborate machinery, a nation which neglects its own shipyards to "purchase its marine afloat" engages in a "strange speculation" indeed, far more hazardous than it would have been in the eighteenth century. To construct and furnish a shipyard now requires not several months but several years. One of the newer yards of this country—not the largest, but an excellent one—represented in its buildings and machinery an investment, before it had built a single ship, of seven or eight million dollars.

NO SHIPYARDS, NO ARMOR CLADS.

One after another, of recent years, nearly all of the great shipyards of the United States capable of building first-class armor clads have gone into bankruptcy or escaped bankruptcy only by radical reorganization. This effectually disposes of the assertion, so familiar once on the part of objectors to national aid to the merchant marine, that American shipbuilders were already making inordinate profits. It is an important fact, which must be remembered, that shipyards possessing the heavy and costly machinery requisite for the construction of steel ships of the line can not be developed and maintained alone by the demands of the coastwise trade, whose vessels as a rule are of moderate power and dimensions. Nor are there enough new battle ships at any time in hand to keep busy and prosperous the number of large shipyards that would be required to meet the shock of a serious and protracted naval war.

If the United States persists in its present policy of neglecting its deep-sea shipping it will not be long before the shipbuilding facilities of the country will have shrunk to what the coast trade can support, and in that case, if great battle ships are to be built in America at all, they must be constructed at the naval stations, with the very much increased cost which characterizes every such attempt to turn a private business or industry over to the Government. At present there is only one naval station in the country which has the means to build a first-rate war vessel. Our entire battle line, with one exception (the Connecticut—the Texas is a second-class vessel), has been launched by the great private shipyards, which will almost certainly vanish if our deep-sea fleet disappears. With these yards, of course, will go their superb staffs of highly trained engineers and their intelligent and experienced workmen. The value of such a national asset as these skillful men are, in time of need, is something which does not need to be argued in any other country but America.

When foreign steamship managers, therefore, urge so plausibly, "If we can do your ocean carrying more cheaply than you yourselves, why not let us do so?" they understand perfectly well that so long as America has no ocean ships of her own her coasts, as well as her commerce, are exposed to foreign aggression. Two of the foreign steamship managers who have been exploiting this plea of "cheapness" most persistently took some of their fastest and best steamships out of their New York service and sold them to Spain as cruisers and commerce destroyers in her war with the United States.

WAR SHIPS NOT TO BE BOUGHT OFFHAND.

In that war the United States found how delusive was one argument which had been used against national aid to our ocean shipping and shipbuilding, as well as against the proper increase of our Navy—that in case of need ships could be bought abroad. With the great emergency fund of $50,000,000 available, and with naval officers and diplomatic agents scouring the docks and arsenals of Europe, our Government was able to find and purchase only a few insignificant craft—two small cruisers, one gunboat, and one torpedo boat. Of these, only one cruiser and the gunboat could be delivered before the actual outbreak of the war, adding almost nothing to the actual fighting power of the United States. The war was won by fighting ships built in American shipyards.

Before the war, the Navy and War Departments did, however, manage to purchase an inadequate number of foreign steamers for transports, colliers, and supply ships—indispensable auxiliaries which ought easily to have been supplied from our own merchant marine if the deep-sea fleet had been in any way sufficient, even for a hundred days' conflict with a fifth-rate power. Of course, these foreign vessels so hastily bought were, as a rule, unfit for the required service. In many cases they were secured only by a sharp straining of the neutrality laws, and in most cases the ships had to be laid up idle in an hour of imperative need because their foreign officers and crews refused to risk their lives for a flag they did not love, in a war in which they had no interest.

MEN AS WELL AS SHIPS.

And this brings up forcibly another important consideration—that if we allow foreigners to do all our ocean carrying, we shall find ourselves without seamen as well as without ships in the shock of a sudden emergency. American officers and sailors have so shrunk in numbers with the decline of our ocean tonnage that the United States Navy has long been without the material for an efficient seagoing reserve, which England, France, Germany, Italy, and Japan have steadily regarded as of the very first importance. Admiral Sampson declared, just after the war with Spain, that in that little three months' affair the United States had exhausted its maritime resources—that we had put afloat all our available, trained officers and men in our first fighting line, and that if a single disaster had compelled us to man another fleet we could not possibly have done it, even if the ships had been forthcoming. Admiral Sampson pointed to this as vivid and conclusive demonstration of the naval need of a great merchant marine.

Foreigners, with their cheap wages and subsidies, may be willing and eager to convey our commerce in peace, but they will not fight our battles and defend our coasts in war. Indeed, as we learned in 1898, they will be likely to be found siding with our enemies, if they are not our enemies themselves.

ANALYSIS OF THE BILL.

In the bill under consideration two distinct forms of aid and encouragement for our ocean shipping and ocean commerce are provided, an analysis of which I will undertake to make. One is in the form of new mail subventions to ten specified lines to be established (as set forth in sections 5 and 6), running, three of them, from the Atlantic coast to Brazil, Argentina, and South Africa, respectively; four from ports of the Gulf of Mexico to Brazil, Central America, and the Isthmus of Panama, Cuba, and Mexico, respectively, and three from the Pacific coast—one to Japan, China, and the Philippines, via Hawaii; one to Japan, China, and the Philippines direct, and one to Mexico, Central America, and the Isthmus of Panama. For these ten steamship lines—most of them entirely new services—a maximum compensation of $2,665,000 is proposed, distributed, $1,050,000 to the three Atlantic lines, $475,000 to the four Gulf of Mexico lines, and $1,140,000 to the three lines on the Pacific Ocean.

Besides these ten subventions it is proposed to add $250,000 to the present subvention of $757,000, payable under the postal aid law of 1891 to the American Line of 20-knot mail steamers from New York to Plymouth, Cherbourg, and Southampton, and $217,000 to the $283,000 now paid under the act of 1891 to the Oceanic Line of mail steamers from San Franciso to New Zealand and Australia.

THE MAIL SUBVENTIONS.

The policy of subventions to regular lines of American steamers carrying the ocean mails under contracts is not a new one in the United States. Sixty years ago President Polk recommended and Congress granted liberal subventions, similar to those now proposed, for American steamship lines to Europe, the West Indies, and the Isthmus of Panama. Some of the most earnest advocates of those subventions at that time were Senators from the Southern section of this country, and though the policy was abandoned in the bitter political struggle that preceded the civil war, it was reestablished on a moderate scale in the postal-aid law of 1891, the most important contract under this law—that for our present trans-Atlantic service—having been arranged under the Administration of President Cleveland.

For these mail subventions, therefore, there are excellent precedents in both the legislative and executive policies of the United States Government. So far as these postal payments are concerned, the present bill involves no new departure from the established practice of the nation, no departure, indeed, from the established practice of the world, for every maritime power, without exception, grants liberal subventions to lines of steamships flying its own flag in order to secure the prompt and regular delivery of mails, merchandise, and passengers on the chief routes of its ocean commerce, and to encourage the maintenance of swift and powerful vessels and skilled officers and seamen as auxiliaries to the fighting fleet in time of war.

NAVAL AUXILIARIES.

The acts of Congress, under President Polk and his successors, granting mail subventions, required that the steamships receiving those subventions should be built on plans approved by the Navy Department. That is the provision also of the postal aid law of 1891, the general terms of which, tested by several years of experience, are made applicable in the present bill. But this bill goes further, in providing that there shall be a naval reserve of officers and men as well as ships ready for the national service. This force of sea militia or naval volunteers is authorized in the very first section of the bill, and annual retainers for the enrolled officers and men, after the practice of the chief naval powers, are provided according to their grade and value. All steamships receiving mail subventions under the terms of this bill are required to carry in their crews a certain increasing proportion of men who are naval volunteers, this being made a condition of the contract.

With the two exceptions already described, the mail subventions offered in the present bill do not apply to any of the routes on which American steamers are now receiving subventions under contracts authorized by the postal aid law of 1891. The proposition is supplementary to that law, and in no sense a substitute for it. With these two exceptions, the present purpose is to secure the establishment of American steamship lines carrying the United States mails, under contract on routes where the act of 1891 has failed to do this, and to open communication with foreign markets with which American merchants now have inadequate communication. The new mail subventions on these 10 routes do not contemplate the building of any very fast steamers of the "greyhound" class, which are confined, as a rule, to the passenger service between the United States and Europe. The highest speed required on any of the new routes in this bill is 16 knots, the lowest 12 knots, yet this speed, while moderate, is somewhat superior to that of the foreign vessels now engaged in similar trades. It guarantees improved dispatch for the United States mails, and yet is easily obtainable by modern ships having a very great capacity for merchandise.

Such mail steamers, it is true, will not be swift enough for the service as scouts and lookouts, described by Admiral Dewey in his valuable report on the merchant marine as auxiliary to the Navy in war. But these vessels will be swift enough for service as fast transports, ammunition ships, colliers, supply ships, etc.—auxiliary vessels which, as Admiral Dewey shows, are also indispensable to the efficiency of our regular war fleets.

THE TWO INCREASED SUBVENTIONS.

There should be an especial word of explanation for the increases proposed by the bill in the compensation of two existing mail contract lines. These exceptions to the general principle of offering no increased pay to lines already receiving Government aid are justified by the peculiar conditions of the two cases. As the report of the Merchant Marine Commission says:

In the first place, the American line to Australasia operates in Pacific waters, where the cost of fuel, labor, etc., is considerably greater than at Atlantic ports. Secondly, the line is required to maintain a very high speed. Furthermore, the ships of the company employ exclusively white crews, instead of the Asiatics utilized by many other Pacific companies. This American line to Australasia not only performs the best service, but now receives the lowest compensation of all lines running to Australasian points. This service is so regular and swift that great numbers of Australasian men of business, even when bound to Europe, are brought en route to the United States, and thereby become regular purchasers of American merchandise. The very heavy increase of our exports to British Australasia, from $12,674,000 in 1896 to $27,401,000 in 1904, is due unquestionably in a great degree to the extraordinary efficiency and regularity of the ill-paid American steamship service out of San Francisco.

The increase provided for in the present bill is $217,000 a year, which, added to the $283,000 now paid, will bring the compensation to the American line up approximately to the compensation paid European steamship companies, and will a little more than restore the original rates of the postal-aid law of 1891, which were cut down to the serious crippling of that measure when the bill passed the House of Representatives.

It is announced authoritatively that unless the subvention to the line to Australasia is increased as proposed, the service, which has been losing heavily every year, will have to be abandoned. In that case our increased Australian trade would inevitably go in large part to other countries, involving a loss of millions of dollars a year to American producers. The Merchant Marine Commission believes that it would be recreant to its duty if it did not provide for the continuance of an American steamship line which has fought so bravely against such heavy odds and has achieved such notable work in the expansion of American commerce.

THE ONE AMERICAN LINE TO EUROPE.

Of the proposed increase of $250,000 to the American Line to Europe the report of the Commission says:

The only other proposed increase in the compensation of the existing contract mail routes is the addition of $250,000 to the maximum of $757,000, now payable under the postal-aid law of 1891 to the 20-knot American line from New York to Plymouth, Cherbourg, and Southampton. This line of four steamers—St. Paul, St. Louis, New York, and Philadelphia—meets the fiercest competition of the State-aided corporations of Europe, soon to be intensified by the new subvention of $1,100,000 granted to the Cunard Company by the British Government on terms so liberal as to make it equivalent to $1,500,000 a year. One possible object of this new British subvention is to drive the Stars and Stripes off the mail routes of the North Atlantic, and it is a very unusual American who would counsel nonresistance to this aggressive purpose of our chief mercantile and maritime competitor.

There are a few faster ships under foreign flags on the North Atlantic than the four American liners, but the American company is the only one which is able or is compelled to perform a full 20-knot service throughout the entire year. It is the habit of foreign companies to lay up their best steamers during boisterous winter months, when passenger traffic is lightest and least profitable, and the voyage is roughest and most expensive, but the four great American steamers, notably good heavy-weather ships, go constantly to and fro, giving to the United States in point of regularity and reliability throughout the entire twelve months the very best Atlantic mail service. This is required by the severe terms of the postal-aid law of 1891, and it deserves adequate recognition by the Government. The proposed addition of $250,000 will approximately restore the original rate of compensation of the law of 1891.

Moreover, it must be remembered that these four American liners are the fastest ocean-going steamers that fly the Star and Stripes, and that they were especially designed for the service as auxiliary cruisers, which they performed so brilliantly in the war with Spain. To allow these historic ships to be forced off the sea would be a national humiliation.

"DELIVERY-WAGON" SHIPS.

In connection with the shipping bill which was before the Senate three or four years ago, there arose, especially from the western and southern sections of the country, a very earnest insistence on the value of what might perhaps be termed the "delivery-wagon" type of ship, the general cargo carrier, or the steam or sail "tramp," especially adapted to the transportation of cotton, wheat, and other bulky articles that make up more than one-half of our exports to foreign lands. This demand was repeated and reiterated at all of the hearings of the Merchant Marine Commission, north, south, east, and west, and has been borne carefully in mind in the framing of the present measure.

Section 2 of the bill provides especially for those "delivery wagon" ships, which may be of modest size and cost, inferior in speed to the regular mail lines, and still indispensable agencies of ocean trade, going hither and thither, wherever freights are to be secured and new markets won, the humble, restless pioneers of commerce. To all of those vessels, steam or sail, section 2 offers a subvention of $5 per gross ton if engaged for a full year in foreign trade, and of smaller sums for shorter periods. This subvention, which is intended to equalize cost of construction, wages, and maintenance between our own and similar foreign craft, is conditional upon the employment in the crew of a certain proportion of naval volunteers, and the vessels accepting it must carry the mails when required free of charge, must be kept seaworthy and effective, must make all ordinary repairs in the United States, and must be held ready to be taken by the Government in time of need. The subvention is payable under a contract for one year at a time, renewable from year to year, but paid in no case to a given vessel for a longer period than ten years.

THE PHILIPPINE AMENDMENT.

In section 2 is embodied an important provision postponing the application of the coastwise principle to our trade with the Philippines from July 1, 1906, when existing law would cause this to take effect, until 1909, as urged by the Secretary of War and recommended by the President.

Economic conditions in the Philippines are said to be such as to make it inadvisable at this time to reserve to American vessels the long-voyage carrying trade between the islands and the United States, as has already been done in the case of Hawaii and Porto Rico. But to continue to hold our Philippine commerce open to foreign ships, and to take no steps to encourage American vessels to enter it, would be to leave our lines of communication with Manila and our other East India military stations and commercial ports in the control of foreign powers, our rivals in trade, and possible enemies in war. This would be so manifestly contrary to the public interest, and contrary to the practice of all other governments possessing such remote dependencies, that a special subvention of 30 per cent above the regular rates, or $6.50 per gross ton per year, is offered in the bill to all American vessels that bring Philippine products to the United States, or convey American products to the Philippines. The voyage to or from the Philippines is so long, and, especially by the Suez route, where high canal dues must be paid, is so expensive, that it seemed to your committee that an extra encouragement ought to be provided for American vessels to participate more largely than they do now in the carrying of our Philippine commerce. The result of the competition of American vessels, aided by this especial subvention, with the foreign vessels now engaged in the trade, will inevitably be to assure favorable freight rates and improved facilities for the trade between the Philippines and the United States on both the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards.

IMPORTANCE OF CARGO CARRIERS.

Such a subvention as is proposed in section 2, to what are primarily cargo vessels, steam or sail, not operating in regular lines under mail contracts, is altogether new to the maritime practice of the United States. The nearest precedent is to be found in the payment for many years after 1792 of bounties to the ships and men of the deep-sea fisheries; these bounties being at first ostensibly in compensation for a rebate of the salt duties. The chief motive of these bounties was a desire to foster the fisheries as a naval reserve, a plan which proved thoroughly successful. In the present bill the vessels and men of the deep-sea fisheries are included on the same terms as the cargo carriers and their seamen, thus restoring an encouragement which the fisheries had enjoyed for seventy years prior to the civil war.

While, therefore, a subvention to cargo carriers and their officers and men undeniably lacks the exact authoritative precedent of the mail subventions in our national history, yet in a general way this subvention also is justifiable on the ground of national defense and the extension of national commerce, and is unquestionably very earnestly demanded by public sentiment. Any measure for the relief of our merchant shipping and the encouragement of our export trade which stops short with the regular mail lines is manifestly incomplete and fails to meet the requirements of our commerce and the reasonable expectations of our people.

OUR BULKY EXPORTS.

Nor is it an adequate reply that several of the chief maritime powers of the world—notably Great Britain and Germany—reserve their national subventions entirely to the relatively fast and expensive steamships of their mail lines and give their general cargo vessels no direct encouragement whatever, for these cargo vessels are indirectly in many ways the beneficiaries of national legislation.

Details of a policy adapted to Great Britain and Germany are not necessarily adaptable to America. Unlike those older nations, the United States is a great exporter of agricultural staples, like raw cotton, breadstuffs, and provisions, which are far more bulky in proportion to their value than are manufactured goods, and can not stand the cost of high-speed transportation. For the especial carrying of these important products the United States requires a large fleet of economical "tramps," or "delivery-wagon" ships. Manifestly the Merchant Marine Commission was deeply impressed with the importance of encouraging the construction of such a fleet, and the subvention of $5 per gross ton to cargo carriers, provided for in section 2 of the present bill, certainly does not lack justification in the hard facts of our commercial needs, and in a fair consideration for the all-important agricultural interests of the West and South, whose need of a foreign market is so urgent.

SOME FOREIGN EXAMPLES.

Moreover, while Great Britain and Germany give no direct subventions to cargo vessels, other maritime nations, notably France, Italy, Austria, and Japan, do pay liberal bounties on both the construction of this class of ships and their navigation. France has increased her tonnage from 1,113,000 in 1893 to 1,760,000 in 1904–5; Italy, from 860,000 to 1,259,000; Austria, from 304,000 to 574,000, and Japan, from 148,000 to 830,000. Norway, with 1,742,000 tons in 1893–94 and 1,779,000 tons in 1904–5, though she gives no premium on the navigation of these "tramps" does grant bounties on their building. Thus, the policy outlined in section 2, while new to American legislation, can find abundant examples in the general practice of the maritime world.

It must not be thought that because cargo vessels are relatively slow they have no military value and no place as naval auxiliaries in war. Of course a slow ship is just as effective as a fast ship in the training of officers and seamen, and, indeed, in this the sail ship is best of all. But, taking a leaf out of our own actual experience in the war with Spain, the records show that of the scores of steamers purchased or chartered as transports, colliers, or supply ships, the great majority were of a speed of from 10 to 12 knots, and very few of a speed as high as 15 knots. Economical carrying ships have their legitimate place in war no less than in commerce.

INCREASE OF TONNAGE TAXES.

The United States is the most liberal nation in the world in its expenditures for river and harbor improvements, light-houses and buoys, and a life-saving service. To these objects the Government gave from 1888 to 1905 the enormous sum of $359,518,885. At the same time almost no protection and encouragement were given to American shipping in the foreign trade, so that a very large part of this $359,518,885 was virtually a subsidy to foreign shipowners, who convey about 90 per cent of our overseas commerce and who, from 1888 to 1905, returned only $11,234,106 in tonnage taxes to the Government.

The tonnage taxes of the United States are lower, in some cases very much lower, than those of the principal maritime nations of the world. Great Britain collects in tonnage taxes considerably more than the entire cost of her light-house establishment. On the other hand, the United States, in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, collected $856,204 in tonnage taxes, while the cost of the light-house and buoy service was $3,686,000. It is not proposed to go as far as Great Britain and to defray from tonnage taxes the entire expense of lighting and buoying the coast, but in section 8 of the bill the tonnage taxes are increased from the present figure of 6 cents a ton on all vessels, American and foreign, arriving from distant foreign ports, to 16 cents a ton, and from 3 cents to 8 cents a ton on all vessels arriving from foreign ports that belong geographically to the North American system. Moreover, the number of arrivals for which the tonnage taxes are imposed is increased from five in a year to ten in a year for any given vessel.

These increased tonnage taxes proposed in the bill fall on all ships, American and foreign alike, engaged in overseas commerce. But, after a British precedent, a rebate of 80 per cent of the duties is made to American vessels carrying boys as apprentices and training young seamen for the merchant service and the naval reserve.

ESTIMATED REVENUE.

Of the income to be produced by the proposed new tonnage taxes the final report of the Merchant Marine Commission says:

The report of the Commission last year estimated that these increased tonnage taxes would furnish a total revenue of $3,025,529, based on the tonnage taxes of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, from which should be deducted tonnage taxes under existing law amounting to $885,841 and rebates to American vessels carrying apprentices of $210,320, leaving a net increase of revenue of $1,929,368.

The probable increase, based on the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, has since been computed in the same way by the Commissioner of Navigation, showing that for that year the bill involves a net increase in tonnage taxes of very close to $1,900,000. That amount, thus verified, may therefore be accepted as a safe measure of the additional revenue provided for in the bill. This increase, it should be further noted, accrues from the beginning of the coming fiscal year, from July 1, 1906, to June 30, 1907, and within that period will have brought into the Treasury an additional revenue of $1,900,000.

ESTIMATED COST OF THIS BILL.

Now, as to the important question of the expenditures involved in this measure for the upbuilding of the American merchant marine. I am gratified to note that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of this body [Mr. ALLISON] is honoring me with his attention. I know that if no other Senator should ask about the cost of this proposed legislation the Senator from Iowa would surely do so before the discussion was closed. Therefore I propose, Mr. President, to be entirely frank and to give as nearly as it is possible to give the cost to the Treasury of the United States for the ten years during which it is proposed that these subventions shall continue if this bill shall be enacted into law precisely as it is written.

Of course it may be taken for granted that the probable cost of the proposed legislation will be wildly exaggerated by its adversaries, most vociferous and most reckless among whom are the agents of the foreign steamship companies that now monopolize nine-tenths of the ocean carrying of the United States and drain out of our country every year, in freight, mail, and passenger receipts, nearly if not quite $200,000,000. The conjectures which such men as these will make of the cost to the country of restoring our merchant fleet will be limited only by the audacity of their imaginations and their trust in the credulity of the American people.

Anticipating that this will be the chief line of the foreign and domestic attack upon the shipping bill, the Merchant Marine Commission caused an especially careful estimate to be made of the expenditures under the several sections of this measure. It is believed that if these estimates err at all it is in every case on the side of liberality, and that if the actual cost of the proposed legislation is found to depart from the estimates either way it will prove to be over rather than under calculated.

A NET GAIN THE FIRST YEAR.

Bearing this in mind, there is now submitted the estimates of the probable expenditures under this bill set forth in the report of the Commission as follows:

The practical result of the proposed bill in the first year of its operation will manifestly be to increase the revenue of the Government. The estimate of the Commission for this first year is as follows:

Net increase of revenue from tonnage		$1,900,000
Expenditures:
A. Naval volunteer retainers	$150,000
B. General subventions to cargo vessels
C. New mail subventions	666,250
D. Increased subventions to two existing mail lines	467,000
		1,283,250
Net gain to the Treasury		616,750

Naval volunteer retainers of $150,000 would provide for a force of 3,000 officers and men, and as this naval-reserve idea is entirely new both to the merchant marine and to the Navy Department, which controls it, it is not probable that more than 3,000 volunteers could be enrolled in the first year.

By the terms of the bill the general subventions to vessels at the rate of $5 per gross ton for twelve months' service in the foreign trade or deep-sea fisheries are not payable, though earned the first year, until "after July 1, 1907," so that there will be no expenditure whatever on this account in the fiscal year preceding.

A year ago the Commission estimated that not more than one-fourth, or $666,250, of the maximum subventions of $2,665,000 for the 10 new mail routes could be expended in the first year under this bill, because most of the steamships requisite for such service do not now exist in the American merchant marine and would have to be constructed in American shipyards. There has been no change in the bill or in current ocean shipbuilding that would alter this conservative calculation.

The increase in the subventions to two existing mail lines now performing contract service under the postal-aid law of 1891 is a new feature of the bill this year. These subventions would probably become payable in the first year of the bill, and therefore are fully allowed for at their maximum of $467,000 in the present estimate. But it should be noted that this particular expenditure remains the same, without increasing in succeeding years.

NET COST THE SECOND YEAR.

For the second year under the proposed bill the Commission presents this estimate of total revenue and expenditures:

Expenditures:
A. Naval volunteer retainers		$300,000
B. General subventions to cargo vessels		1,250,000
C. Mail subventions to new lines		1,500,000
D. Increased subventions to two existing mail lines		467,000
		3,517,000
Net increase of revenue from tonnage		1,850,000
Net cost to the Treasury		1,667,000

The naval volunteer force might possibly be doubled from 3,000 to 6,000 officers and men of the merchant service in this second year of the bill, thus doubling the total retainers, as above estimated.

The general subventions to cargo carriers and deep-sea fishing vessels become payable this second year. These subventions, it should be remembered, are not bounties outright, but are conditioned on the terms of rigid contracts with the Government to perform certain services. It is difficult to forecast how many of these contracts would be undertaken by shipowners, but there is a good basis for an estimate in a careful analysis by the Commissioner of Navigation of the actual voyages of American vessels in foreign commerce in the calendar year 1904. If all of these vessels had fulfilled the contract requirements of the proposed bill, they would have earned somewhat less than $1,000,000 in general subventions. In other words, $1,000,000, under the terms of this bill, would pay subventions to all American ships, steamers suitable for new mail lines included, now engaged in over-seas carrying. This deliberate, exact analysis of a year's actual voyages by the Commissioner of Navigation is proof that the original estimate of the cost of the general subventions in last year's report of the Commission was altogether too high. Allowing that the subventions will immediately increase by 25 per cent the participation of existing American vessels in our ocean-carrying trade, the present estimate of $1,250,000 would seem to be sufficiently liberal.

The deep-sea fishing fleet of the United States is now a small one—about 50,000 tons—and can not be a very important factor in estimating these subventions. For convenience it will be included in this estimate among the cargo carriers. Its vessels are in service for widely varying periods in a year.

By the second year, under this bill, it is believed that enough new mail steamers will have been constructed to put into operation enough of the new mail service to require an expenditure of $1,500,000.

The expenditure for increased subventions to two existing lines—$467,000—reaches its maximum the first year, and does not increase thereafter.

The net increase in the revenue from tonnage would probably be lessened by an increase in the number of foreign voyages of American ships which, after the British practice, receive a rebate of a portion of the tonnage dues for carrying apprentices and training seamen. This explains the decrease from $1,900,000 in the first year of the bill to $1,850,000 in the second.

THE THIRD YEAR.

In the third year, under the proposed bill, from July 1, 1908, to June 30, 1909, the mail subventions to the 10 new lines will probably reach their maximum of $2,665,000 through the building of more ships and the full establishment of these services, and the general subventions to cargo vessels will increase by the building of new tonnage to the extent of $500,000. There will naturally be a further gain in the number of naval volunteers and the amount of their retainers. The estimated cost of the bill the third year is as follows:

Expenditures:
A. Naval volunteer retainers	$400,000
B. General subventions to cargo vessels	1,750,000
C. Mail subventions to new lines	2,665,000
D. Increased subventions to two existing mail lines	467,000
	5,282,000
Net increase of revenue from tonnage	1,750,000
Net cost to the Treasury	3,532,000

COMPENSATING FOR THE SUBVENTIONS.

If the net increase of revenue from tonnage provided for in this bill is to be considered as an offset to the general subventions to cargo vessels, it will be discovered that the increased revenue for the first three years under this bill, or a total of $5,500,000, more than compensates for the aggregate subventions earned by the cargo ships in three years and paid in four, or $5,250,000.

This view of the situation is rendered all the more logical and equitable by the fact, referred to in last year's report of the Commission, that the maximum cost of all the 10 new ocean mail lines, or $2,665,000 a year, is very nearly balanced by the apparent net profit now derived by the United States from its ocean mail service.

Our Government is the only one in the world which year after year has insisted on retaining this profit from its ocean mails, and the policy has been a severe discrimination against the merchant shipping interests of the United States. Great Britain has pursued a radically different course, devoting not only its entire annual ocean mail income, but several million dollars besides, to the subsidizing of lines of British steamships. As the Commission said in its report last year—

There will be general agreement that at least this apparent profit on the ocean mail service of the United States ought to be turned back to the encouragement of our ocean mail lines, and that is exactly what is contemplated in the mail-subvention clause of the proposed legislation. In fact, the annual—not the accumulated—profit from our ocean mail service is hereafter to be devoted to the upbuilding of American steamship communication with distant markets. Great Britain goes beyond this, and applies to this purpose two or three millions more annually. The United States can at least afford to utilize in this way the full amount of its ocean mail net income.

As this net income is steadily increasing it is probable that by 1909, when all the new mail services provided for in this bill may be in operation, the profit from our ocean mail service will be not $2,579,000, as in 1904, but $3,000,000 or more, and enough to compensate for not only the $2,665,000 required for the 10 new mail routes of this bill, but, besides, the increased subventions of $467,000 to two existing lines, or the total ocean mail expenditure of $3,132,000.

THE FOURTH YEAR.

The expenditure on mail lines, new and old, will have reached its maximum in the year from July 1, 1908, to June 30, 1909, and will increase no further under the terms of the proposed bill. Moreover, in the next or fourth year the enrollment of naval volunteers, if it has reached 10,000 officers and men, with total retainers of $500,000, will presumably have exhausted the available material in the American merchant marine, for Great Britain, with a merchant marine much larger than ours will be in 1909 and a regular naval personnel three times as numerous as ours, has a naval reserve, after years of effort, of 33,500.

Therefore the only increased expenditure under this bill beyond the fourth year, from July 1, 1909, to June 30, 1910, will be the general subventions to cargo vessels. The estimate of the cost of this bill in the fourth year is as follows:

Expenditures:
A. Naval volunteer retainers	$500,000
B. General subventions to cargo vessels	2,250,000
C. Mail subventions to new lines	2,665,000
D. Increased subventions to two existing mail lines	467,000
	5,882,000
Net increase of revenue from tonnage	1,600,000
Net cost to the Treasury	4,282,000

AFTER THE FIFTH YEAR.

After this point—the fifth year, from July 1, 1910, to June 30, 1911—the only feature of the proposed bill which will make any increased draft upon the Treasury will be that required to aid the active and useful "tramps," or freighting ships, to fight their way into the world's commerce, and the amount of the subventions will depend upon the need of the cotton planters of the South, the ranchmen and farmers of the West and Southwest, and the manufacturers of the entire country for new tonnage to make new markets for the products of their industry.

HALF A MILLION A YEAR.

A reasonable estimate, however, is that these general subventions to the hard-working cargo ships, the democracy of the ocean, will continue to increase on the average by about $500,000 a year, representing a net annual gain in the tonnage of the American ocean fleet of about one hundred and fifty thousand, some vessels earning subventions for six months, some for nine months, some for the full twelve months. One hundred and fifty thousand tons of new shipping would represent 40 or 50 steamers or sail vessels, and such a net gain as this every year would be a satisfactory result of the general subvention feature of the proposed bill.

For it must be remembered that in order to make a net increase of 150,000 tons very much more than this amount of new shipping would have to be constructed to cover the inevitable waste of storm and wreck and the wearing out of the older tonnage. What this would mean to American shipyards, to the men who work in them, and to the lumbermen, miners, and farmers who furnish the materials away back at the forests, mines, and fields may be conjectured from the fact that last year only 20,000 tons of shipping for over-seas trade—all in one giant vessel—were completed in the United States, and that at the present time only four foreign-going ocean steamers, altogether of about 30,000 tons, are being constructed. All four, it is worthy of note, belong to one of our four or five mail lines now subsidized, and two of these ships are building to replace steamers purchased by the War Department.

GRADUALLY LESSENING AID.

It is stipulated in the bill proposed by the Commission that "no vessel shall receive a subvention under the provisions of section 2 of this act for a longer period than ten years." As to these general subventions to cargo ships, it is the frank belief of the Commission that after a reasonable period they can probably be lessened in amount, having served their purpose of increasing the volume, and thereby reducing the cost of American ship construction and of developing the whole shipping trade to high economic efficiency. For it is a historic fact that the older American merchant marine was built up from 1789 onward under a policy of national aid of some kind or degree, and that its best friends insisted that it would have gone on prospering after that aid was withdrawn but for the radical change from sails to steam and the tremendous advantage given to Great Britain by her immediate and persistent application of subsidies to ocean commerce.

A GREAT NEW TONNAGE.

A net annual addition of 150,000 tons of shipping to the American ocean fleet for ten years would mean a new tonnage of 1,500,000 registered for over-seas carrying. We have now about 900,000 tons so registered; but only about one-half of this is regularly employed. It is probable that 500,000 tons of American shipping, much of it growing old and uneconomical, would actually represent all our tonnage seriously engaged in over-seas voyages. One of the first things that shipowners would do under the stimulus of national encouragement would be to replace their old vessels with others, new, economical, and efficient, and qualified to receive subventions for ten years to come. Moreover, the mail subventions to the ten new regular lines would add from 200,000 to 300,000 tons of high-class steam tonnage to the naval reserve.

COST THE TENTH YEAR.

An increase of $500,000 a year in the general subventions to cargo vessels, together with a gradual lessening of the increased revenue from tonnage, due to the larger participation of American vessels in our ocean trade, would bring the estimated total cost of this bill, in its tenth year, from July 1, 1915, to June 30, 1916, to approximately the following figures:

Expenditures:
A. Naval volunteer retainers	$500,000
B. General subventions to cargo vessels	5,250,000
C. Mail subventions to new lines	2,665,000
D. Increased subventions to two existing mail lines	467,000
	8,882,000
Net increase of revenue from tonnage	1,200,000
Net cost to the Treasury	7,682,000

These estimates show, Mr. President, that for the first year the increased revenues coming from increased tonnage dues will put into the Treasury $616,750 and take nothing out; at the end of the second year the cost to the Treasury will be $1,667,000, at the end of the third year the cost will be $3,532,000, and the fourth year $4,282,000. The cost increases, Mr. President, slightly year by year from the end of the fourth year until the tenth year, when the cost of the tenth year will be $7,682,000, making an aggregate expenditure, provided the bill shall be enacted as it is written and provided the increased tonnage taxes shall be allowed to remain, a little in excess of $40,000,000 for the ten years.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, if I do not interrupt the Senator from New Hampshire, I should like to inquire if the amount of the increased tonnage tax is estimated after the rebate of 80 per cent is allowed to American ships?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator a question for the purpose of showing what we do for other interests.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. GALLINGER. With pleasure.

Mr. HALE. The Senator shows very clearly that in the aggregate about $40,000,000 will be expended for this great interest.

Mr. PERKINS. For ten years.

Mr. HALE. For ten years. Now, does the Senator from New Hampshire remember just what the amount is that is set aside for the one item, for which we all voted, for irrigation in the West?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that is problematical; I think no Senator can answer that question definitely, as it depends upon the income from the sale of the public lands in the arid and semiarid States.

Mr. HALE. It is not less than $30,000,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. Probably not less than ten times that amount ultimately. Certain States are to receive the revenues from the sale of the public lands, as I have stated.

Mr. LODGE. They have received $30,000,000 from the sale of public lands.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes, they have approximately that amount in the Treasury now. Perhaps more.

Mr. LODGE. Thirty million dollars.

Mr. GALLINGER. And the probability is that the aggregate will be ten times that amount before it ends.

Mr. HALE. I call attention to that to show how little is proposed by the pending bill for this great interest compared with what we have done for other interests.

Mr. SCOTT. I am informed that the amount for the coming year will be nearly $60,000,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very likely. There are now $30,000,000 in the Treasury credited to certain States, and of course that is going to increase as the lands are sold.

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER (reading):

Right here it may be said that Great Britain and her colonies next year will expend, including the new Cunard subsidy, between $6,000,000 and $7,000,000 on the encouragement of imperial shipping and commerce; that France will spend about $8,000,000, and that nations like Italy and Japan, with less than half our population and far feebler resources, will spend between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000.

Here is one side of the balance sheet—an expenditure for the development of American shipping and American commerce beginning with nothing and rising gradually to $7,682,000—an average of $4,625,625 a year—an amount less than our chief competitors are now paying, and very much less in proportion to our ability to pay and our power to take advantage of new maritime and commercial opportunities.

WHAT THE BILL GAINS FOR THE NATION.

Now, let us look at the other side and consider what the bill will create for and give to the American people:

1. A force of 10,000 naval volunteers—American officers and men of the merchant marine trained to the naval service and holding the same relation to the Regular Navy held toward the Regular Army by the present militia and National Guard.

Right at this point I want to say that the Navy Department is extremely anxious to have this naval reserve created, having had a bill here last year for that purpose. The Department gives warm support to the proposition embodied in this bill, saying that it is very desirable legislation.

2. A new fleet of from 200,000 to 300,000 tons of steel mail steamships, the naval reserve of fast transports, ammunition ships, supply ships, colliers, repair and hospital ships, dispatch vessels, etc., described in the accompanying report of Admiral Dewey, as essential to the efficiency of our fighting fleet in war.

3. A net addition to our cargo (and fishery) tonnage of 1,500,000 tons, increasing fourfold the actual ocean shipping of the United States, and giving us, exclusive of our distinctive lake and coastwise vessels, a merchant marine much larger than the entire merchant fleet of France or Norway, nearly twice that of Italy, and fully twice that of Japan. Such a new merchant tonnage would enable the United States to carry under its own flag not 10 per cent, as now, of its own imports and exports, but 30 or 40 per cent, earning for our own country, instead of $20,000,000, from $60,000,000 to $80,000,000 a year in freight and passenger receipts.

4. Finally, the creation of ten regular new or strengthened American steamship lines to South America, Central America, Africa, and Asia, supplemented by a large and active fleet of "tramp" or cargo vessels, inevitably opening new markets for many thousands of additional bales of American cotton and thousands of tons of grain, flour, provisions, and manufactured goods—a total amount of increased trade and increased employment for the whole American people impossible to state now in specific figures, but certainly fiftyfold or a hundredfold the entire cost of the national subventions.

Mr. President, I ought to have said that forty-odd million dollars to be expended under this bill for the ten years during which the subvention is to run presupposes that every one of the new lines named in the bill shall be established and in full operation. It may be that they will not all be established. If so, then the cost to the national Treasury will be less than the sum I have named.

TRANSPORTATION VITAL TO TRADE.

The United States has now reached a parting of the ways on this great question. Congress by its action on this proposed measure has very largely the power to determine whether we shall move on in the path which William McKinley would have taken and which President Roosevelt advocates, and add to our immense home market new markets over seas, or whether we shall rest content with our present halfway commercial growth and hereafter depend for such scant increase as we may get on the grace of the shipowners of other and rival nations. There may be those of us who think that we already have trade enough and ships enough, and that we ought to be satisfied to stand still where we are, incidentally ceasing to build any more ships of war, and to leave to our competitors in Europe and to ambitious and aggressive Japan the mastery of those neutral markets from which in a few years we shall be as surely and finally excluded by the enterprise of our rivals as if a wall were built against our trade around the coasts of South America, Asia, Africa, and Australia.

That may be the temper of the American people, but I do not believe it. I know it is not the temper of the people of New England, or of New York, or of Pennsylvania, or of Virginia, or the Carolinas, or of the great States fronting the Mexican Gulf, or of the Commonwealths of the Pacific Ocean. I do not believe that it is the temper of the States of the Mississippi Valley and the Middle West, whose fields and factories produce a very large proportion of our entire exports, and must have increased markets for the maintenance of their prosperity.

Mr. President, since I commenced these remarks I have received information to the effect that the Board of Trade of Brunswick, Ga., has indorsed the bill that I am advocating. What is true of that great commercial organization is true of scores of organizations throughout the country, north and south, their action being found in an appendix to the last report made by the Merchant Marine Commission.

Two great cities of the Mississippi Valley region are and long have been rivals for the trade of that rich and populous valley and the great West beyond. They not only vie with each other in offering goods at favorable prices and of excellent quality, but they have done their utmost to surpass each other in offering facilities for transportation.

If one or the other of these two great cities, Chicago and St. Louis, were to have a fast and regular express and freight service to all parts of the West and Southwest and the other was dependent on stage coaches or the prairie schooners of bygone years, the latter city might offer just as good merchandise at just as favorable rates as its competitor, and yet, because of the lack of the vital element of transportation facilities, it would cut as sorry a figure in those neutral markets as the United States now cuts, for example, in the markets of South America.

We are to-day dependent, as has time and time again been pointed out by the distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, our American ministers, consuls, and others, upon facilities for reaching the South American markets, which bear about the same relation to the subsidized steamship lines of Europe as stage coaches would bear to the swift and regular service of the trunk-line railroads.

Just as the railroad lines which now thread our West and Southwest could not be constructed at first without national or other aid, because of the enormous expense of the initial undertaking, so these great European steamship lines to South America and the other continents were brought into being at first by mail subsidies or other forms of national assistance. The establishment of these great European steamship lines offering favorable facilities to European exporters as compared with our own, makes it still more difficult, and, indeed, impossible for private American enterprise to gain access to those distant neutral markets without some kind of national encouragement. All the American representatives in South America who have declared that we could never get an adequate foothold there without ships of our own have also declared that it was inevitable that these steamship lines could not be operated at first without a loss, and that they would have to be assisted, as their European rivals are assisted, by some measure of generous national legislation.

That this is manifest is proved by the experience of the two lines of steamers which American capital is now operating between our Pacific seaports and the Orient. These enterprises are controlled by experienced and capable managers. They have wrought a great expansion of American trade. But they have never paid a dividend to their owners without national aid, and it is inevitable that unless such aid is soon forthcoming these services, which have proved of such immense value to the farmers of the West and the manufacturers of the entire country, will have to be abandoned, unless, indeed, they pass under foreign flags and are sustained by foreign and rival governments for their own purposes.

OUR ONE NATIONAL FAILURE.

We have paltered with and postponed this question of American ocean trade for forty years. We have seen our shipping and our seamen vanish, and shipyard after shipyard that would have been a glory and a pride to any other nation topple into bankruptcy. We have seen other nations grasping the trade opportunities that should have been our own. Successful in all else, we have retired, baffled and disheartened, from the high seas. It must be acknowledged, and it may as well be frankly acknowledged here and now, that the steady decline of our ocean shipping since 1861 marks the one great and humiliating failure of the Republican party.

But the Republican party has failed here because here alone it has not been true to Republican principles. It has protected everything else which felt the pressure of foreign competition, but it has left unprotected that one industry which feels foreign competition most directly and keenly of all. In the light of forty years of neglect it is little short of a miracle that we should have any ocean ships whatever, any shipowners, any officers, any seamen.

Fortunately, there are still a few left. There is a nucleus of skill and experience on which to build. But if we wait a few years more even this remnant of our shipping will have departed, save for the few lines which are now sustained by their mail pay under the act of 1891.

This bill, proposed by the Merchant Marine Commission and favorably reported by the Senate Committee on Commerce, represents the results of more than a year of conscientious investigation by Senators and Representatives of both political parties. On the need of an American shipping to expand American commerce they are absolutely agreed, and they are agreed also on the advisability of the majority of the definite propositions in the present measure. So close a union between men of opposing parties on this question has never been reached before. Such is the measure which I have had the honor of presenting and now have the honor of advocating before the Senate. In summing up the case for the proposed legislation, I beg to quote from the report of the Commission:

> A new merchant fleet in over-seas commerce of 2,000,000 tons would give the United States the same high rank in merchant shipping which it now holds through its great and powerful Navy. This Navy is now costing $100,000,000 a year, and it is grandly worth it. Nobody who wants the merchant marine built up would have the Navy cut down. The great men of the Navy are powerful champions of the merchant marine. Every strong friend of the merchant marine is a strong friend of the Navy also. The foe of one is apt to be the foe of both. But the Merchant Marine Commission would urge with all earnestness that a great nation, expending $100,0.0,000 a year upon its Navy, can justifiably devote from one to seven millions a year to the encouragement of its merchant shipping, and that the nation which is preparing to build the isthmian canal must stir betimes to build its own ships if it would have its flag borne through the great waterway on something else than yachts and men-of-war.
> Unless the American people begin now, at once, to give some heed to their neglected merchant shipping, they are likely to realize when their canal is completed that they have spent three hundred millions of American money to subsidize the ships and the trade of foreign governments.

Mr. President, the last speech that Mr. Blaine made in this body was on the 27th day of January, 1881. It was on the occasion of a famous debate between Mr. Blaine and the late Senator Beck, of Kentucky, on a resolution offered by Mr. Beck in favor of free ships. Mr. Blaine eloquently combated the proposition that this country should be dependent upon Great Britain for a merchant marine, and in the course of his argument said:

> It is a fact equally remarkable that for the past twenty-five years, or make it only for the past twenty years, from the beginning of the war to this hour, the Congress of the United States has not done one solitary thing to uphold the navigation interests of the United States. Decay has been observed going on steadily from year to year. The great march forward of our commercial rival of old has been witnessed and everywhere recognized, and the representatives of the people of the United States have sat in their two houses of legislation as dumb as though they could not speak, and have not offered a single remedy or a single aid. * * *
> During these years in which Congress has not stepped forward to do one thing for the foreign commerce of this country, for all that vast external transportation whose importance the Senator from Kentucky has not exaggerated, but has strongly depicted, the same Congress has passed ninety-two acts in aid of internal transportation by rail; has given 200,000,000 acres of the public lands, worth to-day a thousand million dollars in money, and has added $70,000,000 in cash, and yet, I repeat, it has extended the aid of scarcely a single dollar to build up our foreign commerce.

From that day to this nothing has been done for American shipping except the enactment of the inadequate Postal Aid Law of 1891, and we are now practically in the situation that

Mr. Blaine so earnestly inveighed against—dependence upon foreign nations in the matter of over-seas transportation. It is to rescue this country from the deplorable condition that to-day exists that this bill is offered to the Congress. It does not go as far as I would wish, but its enactment will do something toward reviving the shipping interests of our country, and in a measure rehabilitating the American merchant marine, a result which all patriotic Americans desire to see accomplished.

COLUMBIA RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ANKENY. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to withhold his motion for a few moments that I may ask for the consideration of the bill (S. 2558) authorizing W. T. Clark to construct a bridge across the Columbia River near the city of Wenatchee, Wash.

Mr. LODGE. I will yield to the request of the Senator from Washington if the bill does not involve debate.

Mr. ANKENY. I am sure the bill will not lead to discussion.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 1, section 1, to strike out all of line 3, as follows:

That William T. Clark and his assigns be, and they are hereby—

And insert—

That the Washington Bridge Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Washington, its successors and assigns, be, and it is hereby—

So as to make the section read:

That the Washington Bridge Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Washington, its successors and assigns, be, and it is hereby, authorized and empowered to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto over and across the Columbia River at a point at or near Wenatchee, in the county of Chelan, State of Washington, for the purposes hereinafter set forth.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 1, section 2, line 13, after the word "said," to strike out "William T. Clark, or his assigns" and insert "bridge company, or its assigns;" so as to read:

SEC. 2. That any bridge constructed under the authority of this act shall be built and located under and subject to such regulations for the security of the navigation of said river as the Secretary of War shall prescribe, and to secure such object said bridge company, or its assigns, shall submit to the Secretary of War for his examination and approval, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, section 2, line 8, after the word "said," to strike out "William T. Clark or his assigns, at his or their expense" and insert "bridge company or its assigns, at its or their expense;" so as to read:

And any changes in said bridge required by the Secretary of War at any time shall be made promptly by the said bridge company or its assigns, at its or their expense.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, section 2, line 13, after the word "company," to insert "or its assigns;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That if the bridge herein authorized be built as a drawbridge, the draw shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signal for the passage of boats; and whatever kind of a bridge is built the said company or its assigns shall maintain thereon, from sunset to sunrise, such lights or other signals as the Light-House Board shall prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, section 3, line 21, after the word "said," to strike out "William T. Clark and his assigns" and insert "bridge company or its assigns;" and in line 25, before the word "assigns," to strike out "he or his" and insert "the said company or its;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That said bridge shall be constructed to provide for the passage of wagons, carriages, automobiles, and vehicles of all kinds, street and suburban car lines, animals and foot passengers, and to provide for telegraph and telephone lines, and two pipe lines to convey water to the east side of the river for irrigation, power, and domestic use; and the said bridge company or its assigns shall have the right to charge, collect, and receive therefor such reasonable rates of toll and under such reasonable rules and regulations for the use of said bridge as the said company or its assigns may prescribe from time to time, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, section 5, line 18, after the word "within," to strike out "one year" and insert "two years;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized is not commenced within two years and completed within three years from the date hereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing the Washington Bridge Company to construct a bridge across the Columbia River near the city of Wenatchee, Wash."

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be authorized to have such printing and binding done as may be required in the transaction of its business.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. BARNES, one of his secretaries.

FISH WHARF, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 4459) authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to make regulations respecting the rights and privileges of the fish wharf, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to make such regulations as they may deem proper for the sale of the rights and privileges of the fish wharf in the District of Columbia.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman from Wisconsin what this bill is about. I could not hear very well.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], who reported the bill and who will explain it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the bill just reported was prepared by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and has been favorably reported by the committee without amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Was it the unanimous report of the full committee?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Briefly, what does it do?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Briefly this: In 1865 the board of aldermen of the District of Columbia passed an ordinance providing for the sale of the privilege and regulating the fish wharf within the District of Columbia in which there is this provision:

Provided, That no wharf or dock shall be deemed eligible to be selected for said purpose unless situated at some point on the north side of the Potomac River between Eleventh street and Fourteenth street west and that no rights shall accrue to the highest bidder as aforesaid unless he be the proprietor or occupant of a suitable wharf or dock within the limits above prescribed.

Now, it so happens that just one individual was provided with a suitable wharf or dock and that he has been the only bidder for this privilege within all these years. The Commissioners regard it as a very valuable privilege, and in order to make regulations so that the District will receive a larger revenue from the sale of this privilege this bill is proposed. That is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. FINLEY. Do I understand the gentleman that this party has a monopoly?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes; an absolute monopoly as the matter now stands. He makes a certain bid every year. There is a provision for the advertising for bids, and on the day on which the bids are let this man is the only bidder, because under the provisions of the old law he is the only person eligible to the privilege. Now, the Commissioners want to make regulations that will enable the District to realize more revenue from this privilege.

Mr. FINLEY. And the purpose of this bill is to break up that monopoly?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The purpose of this bill is to break up that monopoly.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to my colleague on that committee the following amendment to that bill:

Provided, That no letting or selling of such rights or privileges shall be for a longer time than one year.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is the provision of the old law, and I accept the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman to say this is a unanimous report from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I shall make no objection, then.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding: "Provided, That no letting or sale of such rights or privileges shall be for a longer term than one year."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

PREVENTION OF UNLAWFUL WEARING OF BADGES OR INSIGNIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 58.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the same.

The Clerk read the bill as proposed to be amended, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 58) to prevent the unlawful wearing of the badge or insignia of the Grand Army of the Republic or other soldier organizations.

Be it enacted, etc., That whoever, in the District of Columbia, not being a member of the Military Order of the Loyal Legion of the United States, of the Grand Army of the Republic, of the Sons of Veterans, of the Woman's Relief Corps, of the Union Veteran's Union, of the Union Veteran Legion, of the United Spanish War Veterans, and not entitled under the rules of the order to wear the same, willfully wears or uses the insignia, distinctive ribbon, or badge of membership, rosette, or button thereof, or who uses or wears the same to obtain aid or assistance thereby, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $20 or by imprisonment for not more than thirty days, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

ABATEMENT OF NUISANCES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 4461.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4461) to provide for the abatement of nuisances in the District of Columbia by the Commissioners of said District, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the owner of any real property in the District of Columbia shall fail or refuse, after the service of reasonable notice in the manner hereinafter provided, to correct any condition which exists on or has arisen from such property in violation of law or of any regulation made by authority of law, with the correction of which condition said owner is by law or by said regulation chargeable, or to show cause, sufficient in the judgment of the Commissioners of said District, why he should not be required to correct such condition, then, and in that instance, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may, and they are hereby authorized to, cause such condition to be corrected; assess the cost of correcting such condition and all expenses incident thereto (including the cost of publication, if any, hereinafter provided for) as a tax against the property on which such condition existed or from which such condition arose, as the case may be; and carry such tax on the regular tax rolls of said District, and collect such tax in the same manner as general taxes in said District are collected: Provided, That the correction of any condition aforesaid by said Commissioners under authority of this section shall not relieve the owner of the property on which such condition existed, or from which such condition arose, from criminal prosecution and punishment for having caused or allowed such unlawful condition to arise or for having failed or refused to correct the same.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of carrying into effect section 1 of this act the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and all other persons, including contractors and employees of contractors acting under their authority or by their direction, be, and they are hereby, authorized to enter upon and into any lands and tenements in said District, during all reasonable hours, to inspect the same and to do whatever may be necessary to correct, in a good and workmanlike manner, any condition that exists on or has arisen from such lands or tenements in violation of law or of any regulation made by authority of law, with the correction of which condition the owner of said lands or tenements is by law or such regulation chargeable. Any person who shall hinder, interfere with, or prevent any inspection or work authorized by this act shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $100 or by imprisonment for a period not exceeding three months, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 3. That for the purposes of this act any notice required by law or by any regulation aforesaid to be served shall be deemed to have been served (a) if delivered to the person to be notified or if left at the usual residence or place of business of the person to be notified with a person of suitable age and discretion then resident therein, or (b) if no such residence or place of business can be found in said District by reasonable search if left with any person of suitable age and discretion employed therein at the office of any agent of the person to be notified, which agent has any authority or duty with reference to the land or tenement to which said notice relates, or (c) if no such office can be found in said District by reasonable search if forwarded by registered mail to the last known address of the person to be notified and not returned to the post-office authorities, or (d) if no address be known or can by reasonable diligence be ascertained or if any notice forwarded as authorized by the preceding clause of this section be returned by the post-office authorities if published on three consecutive days in a daily newspaper published in the District of Columbia, or (e) if by reason of an outstanding unrecorded transfer of title the name of the owner in fact can not be ascertained beyond a reasonable doubt, if served on the owner of record in the manner hereinbefore in this section provided. Any notice required by law or by any regulation aforesaid to be served on a corporation shall for the purposes of this act be deemed to have been served on any such corporation if served on the president, secretary, treasurer, general manager, or any principal officer of such corporation in the manner hereinbefore provided for the service of notices on natural persons holding property in their own right, and, if required to be served on any foreign corporation, if served on any agent of such corporation personally or if left with any person of suitable age and discretion residing at the usual residence or employed at the place of business of such agent in the District of Columbia. Every notice aforesaid shall be in writing or printing or partly in writing and partly in printing; shall be addressed by name to the person to be notified; shall describe with certainty the character and location of the unlawful condition to be corrected, and shall allow a reasonable time to be specified in said notice within which the person notified may correct such unlawful condition or show cause why he should not be required to do so.

SEC. 4. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

SEALER AND ASSISTANT SEALER OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 4463.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4463) to amend section 2 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes."

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of the act approved March 2, 1895, entitled "An act for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the sealer of weights and measures shall give bond to the District of Columbia in the penalty of $5,000, with two sureties or with the guaranty of a bonding company, to be approved by the Commissioners, conditioned on the faithful discharge of the duties of his office, and shall take and subscribe on oath or affirmation before the Commissioners that he will faithfully and impartially discharge the duties of his office, which bond or guaranty and oath shall be deposited with the Commissioners of the District of Columbia."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

REPORT UPON THE IMPROVEMENT OF THE ANACOSTIA RIVER FLATS.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask the present consideration of the bill S. 71.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin calls up Senate bill No. 71, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 71) requiring the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to prepare a report upon the improvement of the Anacostia River flats.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to submit to Congress a report upon the improvement of the so-called flats of the Anacostia River from its mouth to the District line, with recommendations and estimates of cost.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if this bill has been reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. SULZER. Unanimously?

Mr. BABCOCK. Unanimously.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to inquire what the purpose of this bill is?

Mr. BABCOCK. The purpose of the bill is to get the facts and figures which the Commissioners have in their possession in reference to the cost of improving the Anacostia flats, if it is ever done. It involves no expense whatever.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why could not that be done by a simple resolution of inquiry?

Mr. BABCOCK. Well, it is presented to the House in this way by the Senate. It has passed the Senate, and the easiest and quickest way to get the information is to pass it here.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the passage of this bill call for any appropriation?

Mr. BABCOCK. No appropriation; no extra expense attendant upon it at all.

Mr. FITZGERALD. My purpose of inquiry is this: Does the passage of this bill put any improvement upon a footing that would entitle an appropriation to be made on an appropriation bill without further legislation?

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, it is impossible to hear the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I desire to know whether, if this bill be passed, that hereafter it would be in order to make appropriations for this purpose upon appropriation bills without further legislation?

Mr. BABCOCK. This would not affect the right of the Appropriation Committee one way or another in the matter. It simply places before Congress this information, that is all; and I would say to the gentleman that, so far as the Committee on the District of Columbia is concerned, there is no intention, I believe, to bring in any proposition before this House calling for the appropriation of money.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question?

Mr. BABCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Why does this come in the form of an act instead of a joint or concurrent resolution?

Mr. BABCOCK. I think the gentleman will have to propound that question at the other end of the Capitol, as this is a Senate bill.

Mr. MANN. As it is not possible for me to propound that question at the other end of the Capitol, and probably never will be, I am compelled to rely upon the gentleman from Wisconsin, whom I wish might be translated to the other end of the Capitol, where he properly belongs.

Now, I understand a simple resolution can call for this information; I do not see the object of an act of Congress calling for it.

Mr. BABCOCK. I think the resolution would have been ample; a joint resolution from either House.

Mr. MANN. Is it not the purpose always to permit the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to put this in the river and harbor bill—a perfectly legitimate purpose, I suppose?

Mr. BABCOCK. I have no knowledge or information on that subject at all.

Mr. MANN. Would not an appropriation for this improvement come through the River and Harbor Committee, or the authorization of it?

Mr. BABCOCK. I think that the appropriations within the District have been made by the Appropriations Committee in the House in the past.

Mr. MANN. Is this an improvement of the Anacostia River, or an improvement of adjoining land?

Mr. BABCOCK. This is the old question of the reclamation of the Anacostia Flats.

Mr. MANN. Who owns that land?

Mr. BABCOCK. The Government, I assume.

Mr. MANN. The only method of reclamation is by improving the river, is it not?

Mr. BABCOCK. It would be similar to the work that was done here opposite the wharf where the island was made by reclamation into a Government park. I suppose this work, if ever done, would be similar to that. I would say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that the committee has no pride in the form of this bill. If he thinks there is anything wrong, we better turn it down. The committee thought it a simple matter, and believed Congress should have the information.

Mr. MANN. It seems that the House may properly inquire for information without the gentleman thinking that it is a reflection upon his committee, which we have no thought of doing.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like to ask the gentleman if the Commissioners have this information in their possession or if a new investigation is required.

Mr. BABCOCK. I understood that the information is practically ready.

Mr. SULZER. Let me ask the gentleman how much is it going to cost the Government to get this information?

Mr. BABCOCK. It is all practically prepared, and I understand there will be no expense whatever.

Mr. SULZER. Then, Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin whether, if the Commissioners decided to make any further investigation, it would not require some appropriation from Congress in the future?

Mr. BABCOCK. I think it would. I do not think they have any money available to make any further investigation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And would not the passage of this bill make a provision for appropriation upon the District of Columbia appropriation bill?

Mr. BABCOCK. The information that the committee has is that the Commissioners have the facts and figures practically ready to submit to Congress now without any additional investigation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But that would not preclude the Commissioners asking for the information—to make further investigation under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. BABCOCK. I do not understand that there is any further investigation necessary that will involve any expense. This simply authorizes or directs them to make a report to Congress.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask the gentleman to yield me two or three minutes on this question. I will move to recommit or lay it on the table.

Mr. MANN. Before the gentleman from Wisconsin yields to the gentleman from New York, will the gentleman pardon me for making a suggestion to him with reference to it? Under the rules of the House an appropriation for a public work in progress is in order. Now, if this information is obtained by a resolution, it is not a public work in progress; but if we pass an act of Congress requiring the Commissioners to submit to Congress an estimate of the cost—query: Will it not be called a public work in progress and thereupon appropriation become in order? There can be no other purpose for putting this in the form of an act of Congress, it seems to me. I think the gentleman ought to be willing to amend it, so that instead of being an act of Congress it will be a concurrent resolution.

Mr. BABCOCK. The committee has no particular interest in the form of the measure. We simply think this information is desirable. I am perfectly willing that an amendment may be made making this a joint resolution instead of an act, if the gentleman thinks it would be any better.

Mr. MANN. It ought to be a concurrent resolution, I fully agree with the gentleman. I have no doubt whatever, and I take the same views as the gentleman from New York has taken and others have taken.

Mr. BABCOCK. Does the gentleman desire time?

Mr. MANN. I would like to offer an amendment at the proper time changing it from an act to a concurrent resolution.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be laid aside temporarily to give gentlemen time to prepare an amendment.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that will be done.

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF KALORAMA ROAD.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill H. R. 130 in the House as in Committee of the Whole, under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the consideration of the bill 130, and that it may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 130) authorizing the extension of Kalorama road NW.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed, within thirty days after the passage of this act, to institute in the supreme court of the District of Columbia sitting as a district court, by petition, particularly describing the lands to be taken, proceedings to condemn the land necessary for the extension of Kalorama road from Eighteenth street to Champlain street with a width of 50 feet.

SEC. 2. That of the amount found to be due and awarded as damages for and in respect of the land condemned for extension of Kalorama road as herein provided, such amount thereof shall be assessed by the jury hereinafter provided for as benefits, and to the extent of such benefits, against those pieces or parcels of land on each side of said road as extended, and also on any or all pieces or parcels of land which will be benefited by the opening of said road as said jury may find said pieces or parcels of land will be benefited; in and determining the amounts to be assessed against said pieces or parcels of land the jury shall take into consideration the respective situations of such pieces or parcels of land and the benefits they may severally receive from the extension of said street as aforesaid: Provided, That if the aggregate amount of the benefits to be assessed, as determined by said jury pursuant to the provisions hereof, is less than one-half of the amount of the damages awarded for and in respect of the land condemned, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may, in their discretion, reject the award and assessment of said jury, and all proceedings hereunder shall be null and void.

SEC. 3. That the said court shall cause public notice of not less than ten days to be given of the filing of said proceedings by advertisement in such manner as the court shall prescribe, which notice shall warn all persons having any interest in the proceedings to attend court at a day to be named in said notice and to continue in attendance until the court shall have made its final order ratifying and confirming the award of damages and assessment of benefits of the jury; and in addition to such public notice said court, whenever in its judgment it is practicable to do so, may cause a copy of said notice to be served by the marshal of the District of Columbia, or his deputies, upon such owners of the land to be condemned as may be found by said marshal or his deputies within the District of Columbia.

SEC. 4. That after the return of the marshal and the filing of proof of publication of the notice provided for in the preceding section, said court shall cause a jury of seven judicious, disinterested men, not related to any person interested in the proceedings, and not in the service or employment of the District of Columbia or of the United States, to be summoned by the marshal of the District of Columbia, to which jurors said court shall administer an oath or affirmation that they are not interested in any manner in the land to be condemned nor are in any way related to the parties interested therein, and that they will without favor or partiality, to the best of their judgment, assess the damages each owner of land taken may sustain by reason of the extension of said road and the condemnation of lands for the purpose of such extension and assess the benefits resulting therefrom, as hereinbefore provided. The court before accepting the jury shall hear any objections that may be made to any member thereof, and shall have full power to decide upon all such objections and to excuse any juror or cause any vacancy in the jury when impaneled to be filled; and after said jury shall have been organized and shall have viewed the premises, said jury shall proceed, in the presence of the court, if the court shall so direct, or otherwise, as the court may direct, to hear and receive such evidence as may be offered or submitted on behalf of the District of Columbia, and by any person or persons having any interest in the proceedings for the extension of said avenue. When the hearing is concluded the jury, or a majority of them, shall return to said court, in writing, its verdict of the amount to be found due and payable as damages sustained by reason of the extension of said road under the provisions thereof and of the pieces or parcels of land benefited by such extension and the amount of the assessment for such benefits against the same.

SEC. 5. That if the use of a part only of any piece or parcel of ground shall be condemned, the jury in determining its value shall not take into consideration any benefits that may accrue to the remainder thereof from the extension of said road or highway, but such benefits shall be considered in determining what assessment shall be made on or against such part of such piece or parcel of land as may not be taken as hereinbefore provided.

SEC. 6. That the court shall have power to hear and determine any objections which may be filed to said verdict or award, and to set aside and vacate the same, in whole or in part, when satisfied that it is unjust or unreasonable, and in such event a new jury shall be summoned, who shall proceed to assess the damages or benefits, as the case may be, in respect of the land as to which the verdict may be vacated, as in the case of the first jury: Provided, That if vacated in part the residue of the verdict and award as to the land condemned or assessed shall not be affected thereby: And provided further, That the exceptions or objections to the verdict and award shall be filed within thirty days after the return of such verdict and award.

SEC. 7. That when the verdict of said jury shall have been finally ratified and confirmed by the court, as herein provided, the amounts of money awarded and adjudged to be payable for lands taken under the provisions hereof shall be paid to the owners of said land by the disbursing officer of the District of Columbia from moneys advanced to him by the Secretary of the Treasury upon requisitions of the Commissioners of said District, as provided by law; and a sufficient sum to pay the amounts of said judgments and awards is hereby appropriated out of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 8. That when confirmed by the court the several assessments herein provided to be made shall severally be a lien upon the land assessed, and shall be collected as special improvement taxes in the District of Columbia, and shall be payable in five equal annual installments, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum from and after sixty days after the confirmation of the verdict and award. In all cases of payments the accounting officers shall take into account the assessment for benefits and the award for damages and shall pay only such part of said award in respect of any lot as may be in excess of the assessment for benefits against the part of such lot not taken, and there shall be credited on said assessment the amount of said award not in excess of said assessment. The said court may allow amendments in form or substance in any petition, process, record, or proceeding, or in the description of property proposed to be taken, or of property assessed for benefits, whenever such amendments will not interfere with the substantial rights of the parties interested.

SEC. 9. That each juror shall receive as compensation the sum of $5 per day for his services during the time he shall be actually engaged in such services under the provisions hereof.

SEC. 10. That the sum of $300 is hereby appropriated, out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, to provide the necessary funds for the costs and expenses of the condemnation proceedings taken pursuant hereto.

SEC. 11. That no appeal by any interested party from the decision of the supreme court of the District of Columbia confirming the assessment or assessments of benefits or damages herein provided for nor any other proceeding at law or in equity by such party against the confirmation of such assessment or assessments shall delay or prevent the payment of award to others in respect to the property condemned nor delay or prevent the taking of any of said property sought to be condemned nor the extension of such road: Provided, however, That upon the final determination of said appeal or other proceeding at law or in equity the amount found to be due and payable as damages sustained by reason of the extension of said road under the provisions hereof shall be paid as hereinbefore provided.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, there is a principle involved in this bill of such importance that I think it better be considered in the Committee of the Whole. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 130 and also the bill H. R. 127.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill H. R. 130 and also the bill H. R. 127.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. DENBY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering two bills, the first of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 130) authorizing the extension of Kalorama road northwest.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with, as it has just been read to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I want to say, in reference to the bill——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that we will have order, so that we can hear. We have not been able to hear anything this morning.

Mr. BABCOCK. If it is in order, I will ask for the reading of the bill for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no further debate, the Chair will order the bill to be read under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I think there is an important question involved in this bill to which the House ought to pay some attention. As I understand it, oftentimes there are some gentlemen who live and own lands in the vicinity of this city who desire to enhance the value of those lands from acreage property to that which is sold by the foot. In other words, they want streets and alleys to subdivide their lands, and they want the government of the city to compensate them for these streets and alleys, that when established are to give greater, much greater, value to their lands. They propose to do it on what they call an exceedingly fair basis; that they shall pay a portion of the cost that their lands will be enhanced by the action that is proposed of subdivision. Under some circumstances that might be well, and I might be willing to say that that would be fair; but under the methods that are pursued in this city that kind of procedure never is fair. I think we have a right to say that we distrust all these appraisements that are made in the city of Washington in cases where the Government proposes to take land for public uses. The Government is always outraged by these performances. Let me cite you an instance, Mr. Chairman. A block southeast from where we now stand was recently acquired by the Government by appraisement by the method that is proposed to be followed, substantially, by this bill. These lands cost the Government of the United States more than three times the sum that they had been appraised at for taxation purposes. We are told whenever it is proposed to increase the taxes of the property owners of the District that they pay excessive taxation; that their lands are unduly valued; that uniformly they sustain a valuation fully equal to two-thirds of the sum that they would sell for in the market.

Now, for the purposes of this argument I am going to assume that that may be true, and that it would have been right under the circumstances of which I speak that the Government should have paid a third more than the appraised value of these lands; yet it was compelled to pay three times the value of these lands—three times, sir!

The same experience was had when the block northeast of the Capitol was secured to the Government. Again we had to pay more than three times the assessed value. So it is with all the property that the Government acquires through this method of appraisement when the appraisements are made by the real-estate ring of the city of Washington. [Applause.] And I think a halt ought to be called in that method of making appraisement and compensation. I am opposed to using the Government of the United States or the District of Columbia for the purpose of further exploiting the lands in the suburbs of this city. We have gone to the extreme in that respect.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BABCOCK. I desire to correct the gentleman in one statement. This is not in the suburbs, but it lies in a thickly populated part of the city between Florida avenue and the crest of the hill.

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Mr. BABCOCK. There is no acre property adjoining or anywhere near it.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, the principle that I have tried to discuss is the same. You will find it in this bill, as you find it in all these other propositions.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am very glad to hear what the gentleman says about this matter. Can he tell me now whether the Government appealed from this oppressive appraisement and was relieved from having to pay three times the value; and if not, why not?

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not know whether the Government has the right of appeal or where the appeal would lie. I presume that in this, as in all matters of condemnation, there is the possibility of appeal—that is, that parties would have their right to challenge the appraisement in the courts appointing the appraisers. But I think you will find——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Of course the landowners can appeal; but has the Government the right to appeal or to refuse to pay this award?

Mr. HEPBURN. I will not say whether it has the right of appeal or not, but I certainly agree with the gentleman that there ought to be some power of review. Possibly it would be impracticable. I do not know whether you could accomplish anything by it. I remember reading some of the proof in the case of the condemnation of Rock Creek Park, and I was astonished to find that there were men in the city of Washington who, under the solemnity of an oath, would fix a valuation of $35,000 an acre for lands that were far away from the limits of this city.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is not an unusual thing for the landowner to appeal, and I do not see any reason why the Government, that has to pay for the land, should not have the right of appeal.

Mr. HEPBURN. I think you are certainly right. I doubt whether under circumstances like these the Government ought to pay for the streets and alleys when the lands are subdivided and made a part of the city, as would be the case should this bill pass. There is an astonishing and extraordinary augmentation of values always in cases of this kind, and I think that we ought to assume that the necessary land should be given when this great value is added to the property.

I do not know the particulars of this special case, and therefore I do not choose to discuss them, but I want to speak against the principle. I want to speak against the principle that is involved in enlarging the streets and alleys of the city of Washington as long as those that we now have are in the condition that they are. There is not a continuous mile of street in the city of Washington where there is to-day a respectable driveway. We talk about the beauties of the Capital, we talk about the expenditure of millions to make it the most beautiful city in the country; and yet, if you will drive over any of the highways of this city, you will find they are in a lamentable condition. I have to pass daily over a street right here in our vicinity—East Capitol street. It is in such a condition, I suppose from the scandalously faulty first construction or first surfacing, that it seems to one as he rides that he is passing over one of the old-fashioned army corduroy roads. The surface is cracked from one end to the other, the cracks extending from the center to the curb. Every 5 or 6 or 10 feet you come to the jar and jolt that results from that uniformity of defect.

Another street over which I frequently ride—B street NE.—has two blocks where I think there is not to be found a single square rod in which the asphaltum surface has not disappeared in places, leaving a jolting hole that entirely destroys the pleasure or the convenience of a drive. This street has been in that condition for months and months, and I understand the reason to be that there is no money available for the purpose of putting in proper and passable condition the streets that we have. When I say passable condition I do not mean that you can not pick your way over those streets, but I mean that they are not in passable condition, as the highways of the great Capital of the United States ought to be. And yet here they stand reaching out for more streets, more highways, more places in which to spend money that they say they do not have. I think there ought to be a halt called on all movements that look to the securement of greater extension of highways until those we have are brought somewhere nearly into the decent condition that the streets of the great Capital should be in. [Applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole House to what I deem a radical defect in this legislation, in any event. I by no means hesitate to indorse the position taken by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], but I want to call attention to the very peculiar condition that is proposed in the proceeding by which these condemnations are to take place. In the first place, the verdict is to be rendered by a majority of the jury, thereby making it very much easier of obtainment than if the entire jury should be compelled to join. And I may say that my observation and experience, which has been pretty lengthy, is that in matters of condemnation it is not very difficult to get one-half of the jury with the most inflated idea of the value of the premises sought to be condemned. In the first place, I call the attention of the committee to this fact, that there is no provision in the bill for an appeal, although I think it probable that under the general statutes there may be an appeal provided for somewhere that would carry this case to some other court on appeal, and there is a possible inference in the bill itself that that is the idea of whoever concocted the very adroit scheme of this measure.

The provision of the bill is that the condemnation shall be in the supreme court of the District of Columbia and that the court shall have the power to hear exceptions to the manner of procedure, just as in any other court of original jurisdiction the court that is to confirm or set aside the verdict of the jury has a right to hear exceptions to the report; but at the end of that time there is no provision for any appeal to another court or tribunal, although I say it is possible that there may be under same general statute.

But here is the provision which I condemn and which ought not to be permitted for one moment:

SEC. 11. That no appeal by any interested party from the decision of the supreme court of the District of Columbia confirming the assessment or assessments of benefits or damages herein provided for nor any other proceeding at law or in equity by such party against the confirmation of such assessment or assessments shall delay or prevent the payment of award to others in respect to the property condemned nor delay or prevent the taking of any of said property sought to be condemned nor the extension of such road: Provided, however, That upon the final determination of said appeal or other proceeding at law or in equity the amount found to be due and payable as damages sustained by reason of the extension of said road under the provisions hereof shall be paid as hereinbefore provided.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman inform the committee whether or not there is a provision for any officer, district attorney, or prosecuting attorney, or any legal representative of the Government, to appear to represent the Government in these condemnation proceedings?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not find any provision of that character in this bill. I do not know what the general statutes may provide in that regard.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. All that is provided is that it shall have a jury, bring in the witnesses, and that five of the jurors may bring in a verdict, and that ends it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; and they get $5 apiece a day for doing it. Now, Mr. Chairman, what I want to get at is this: That in any proceeding anywhere for the condemnation of real estate, if an appeal is taken from the finding and judgment of the court below, the proceeding is suspended until the final hearing of the court and the judgment becomes a finality. I think this legislation is dangerous legislation, and it is made entirely too easy to extend the benefits of the treasury of the District of Columbia out into the improvement of these lands. I do not care whether they are just outside of Florida avenue or where they are. The whole principle of the bill is vicious, and it ought not to pass.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this is not the first time in my experience as a Member of this House that we have had our attention sharply challenged to this kind of lawless imposition upon the Government rights in reference to eminent-domain proceedings. I remember, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman who is now the Speaker of this House said, with reference, I believe, to some asylum where condemnation proceedings were about to be had, that it was impossible to get an honest eminent-domain proceeding held in the District of Columbia.

He has been here for about forty years. This morning we hear the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], a man who is familiar with the District of Columbia, make the appalling statement that in building the offices for the Senate and the offices for the House the Government has been held up and made to pay three times the assessed value of the property. We hear the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], who is as well acquainted with the geography of this District and this legislation, I dare say, as any man in the District, and yet we do not hear a single solitary suggestion from the distinguished gentleman who reports this bill to the House. Ah, the outrageous oppression that has been visited on the Government, cited by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]! It is time to call a halt. This is no man's State. It is not mine; it is not yours. We are the city council for the District of Columbia. With such testimony as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] has cited here, we should do one of two things—we should defeat this bill or provide that there shall be an appeal if the Government authorities think there should be one, and that there shall be counsel present to represent the District in these cases, to look after the interest of the District. Why, I have never heard in my life of such a stupendous proposition as this in eminent-domain cases. The city that I have the honor to represent, Nashville, the city attorney, with marked ability and great energy, represents the mayor and the city council in these cases.

Why, I remember the condemning of Fort Negley, where my friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] and my friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] were about forty years ago. They did not, however, make a speech at that time, as they were very busy otherwise. The city condemned that whole hill for a reservoir; and, by the way, a neighbor of President Harrison built the reservoir. We had a great lawsuit about the value of this land, and the city of Nashville was not only represented by Judge Anderson, one of her best lawyers, but, if I mistake not, we employed additional counsel, and the matter was settled in the supreme court of the State.

Mr. SIMS. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this bill ought to be defeated?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Nobody has explained it. It has not been read.

Mr. SIMS. Why, it has been read twice.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, I mean in the hearing of the House. The first reading of the bill was waived.

Mr. SIMS. Read by paragraphs.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I venture to say there are not five men in this House who know what is in this bill.

Mr. SIMS. Is the gentleman one of them?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Are you?

Mr. SIMS. No; I know all about it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman who reports this bill has not explained it.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman not think it would be a good idea for somebody who does know something about it to explain it?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am, as usual, groping in darkness, simply because the chairman of the committee who brings in this bill has not explained it to the House; yet his duty is to explain it.

Mr. SIMS. But he explained it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, explained it. But there are not five men in this House, unless they sat around the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK], who heard a word of this bill. I sat here and listened and tried my best to hear it.

Mr. SIMS. I would like to inform the gentleman now that not a cent of this comes out of the Government.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I don't care; it is wrong anyway.

Mr. SIMS. Wrong to pay people for their property?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No; but the principle upon which this bill is based.

Mr. SIMS. Well, what is the principle?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. There is nobody to represent the Government.

Mr. SIMS. But the Government is not interested.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If my friend knows so much about it, why doesn't he explain it? He knows that I hang upon his words; he knows that I have great confidence in him.

Mr. BABCOCK. I can explain it in two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Wait a moment. I am talking to my friend the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS]. Now, if the gentleman from Tennessee will explain this bill and tell me the Government of the United States has not got any money invested in it and is not liable, that the people of the United States are not liable in the least degree, and that the square thing will be done, and if the Government has any rights in it there will be the right of appeal, and that the other party will have the right of appeal, and that we will have some lawyer there to represent the Government, if the Government is interested, then I think it would be a fairly good bill.

Now, how is this bill in these matters?

Mr. BABCOCK. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Just a moment. Will my colleague explain that?

Mr. SIMS. Why, certainly; but as a courtesy to the chairman of the committee, who has been accused of not explaining it, I think he ought to have an opportunity to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am not yet through with this matter.

Mr. BABCOCK. I want to explain to the gentleman from Tennessee why the chairman of the committee had not explained the bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well——

Mr. BABCOCK. Now, the reason ought to be perfectly apparent and plain that I have not had an opportunity to get the floor.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Who has not?

Mr. BABCOCK. The chairman of the committee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Wait a minute; did the gentleman not have a right to the floor when he reported the bill, and he sat down and the gentleman from Iowa got up and made his usual Gatling-gun speech at this bill and shot about forty holes through it, and then the gentleman from Ohio got up and fired a few rifle shots and then turned the fragments over to me? Now, if you can hold up your hands and show that this bill ought to be passed, I will yield the floor and let the gentleman explain the bill.

Mr. BABCOCK. I simply want to answer the gentleman's question as to why it has not been explained. Now, when the Gatling gun's fire started at the bill through courtesy I immediately sat down to listen to what the gentleman had to say.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I thought the gentleman scared the gentleman from Wisconsin off and——

Mr. BABCOCK. Then the gentleman from Ohio came up on the firing line, and I thought I could secure no opportunity for recognition, and then the gentleman from Tennessee came to the front——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Tennessee always comes to the front when she thinks a square deal is needed and ought to be had. Now, I will yield the floor if the gentleman will explain this bill. Will the gentleman explain it?

Mr. BABCOCK. I did intend to do so.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then I yield the floor. I reserve my time if I have any left, because I want to be heard, too.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to take the floor or borrow any part of the gentleman's time. I desire to be recognized in my own right. Now, Mr. Chairman and gentleman of the House, this bill is an exact duplicate, word for word, of a large number of bills which have been passed by this House. There is absolutely nothing new in it except the description of the property. It provides, first, that this little piece of ground, which connects Eighteenth street with Champlain avenue, a distance of some 200 feet, shall be opened. Why? For the use and benefit of the general public. There is no acreage property there; there is no real estate interest there. It is desired by the officials and by the government of the District of Columbia to accommodate the people who live on Champlain avenue and in that section.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BABCOCK. Now, do not interrupt me, please. Now, Champlain avenue runs from Florida avenue, at the foot of the hill, clear up to the top of the hill, a distance of over 2,000 feet. There is no highway between the two streets by which the people can reach the street-car lines; that is, the Capital Traction Company line and Chevy Chase line where it runs out Eighteenth street and out over the bridge across Rock Creek. Now, this is the reason that has necessitated the enactment of this legislation. Now, how are you going to pay for it? In the first place, we proceed under the law. A jury is appointed which assesses benefits and damages. Under the provisions of the bill 50 per cent must be assessed as benefits, which are to be paid by the property owners, and 50 per cent is to be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, but not a penny out of the United States Treasury. Now, the estimated cost of this improvement is $6,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield before he leaves that very important proposition?

Mr. BABCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. My colleague says that the Government of the United States is in no way liable for the expense attending this matter. We make a little appropriation of three or four thousand dollars to pay the expenses. Now, you say the money paid the damaged owners is paid out of the District treasury.

Mr. BABCOCK. Out of the District revenues.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How do those revenues get into the District treasury?

Mr. BABCOCK. From taxation in the District of Columbia only; not a cent from the Government. The gentleman must understand no moneys can be taken out of either the District or the United States treasuries without an act of this body—not a dollar.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman think we ought to protect that treasury as well as the Treasury of the United States? Is there any lawyer going to represent the District treasury down before this court?

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, the District of Columbia is represented by able attorneys.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. In this kind of procedure?

Mr. BABCOCK. In this kind of procedure; yes, sir.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Who are the gentlemen? What are their names?

Mr. BABCOCK. I can not give the gentleman all of the names. Mr. Duvall, who recently passed away, was one of the attorneys for years, and Mr. Sinclair is in charge of matters of this kind.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. There is not a word said in the bill about any attorney representing the city.

Mr. BABCOCK. No, sir; the attorney for the District of Columbia or some of his assistants represent the District of Columbia in all legal matters.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman object to an amendment?

Mr. BABCOCK. I object to any amendment of that kind to the bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Requiring an attorney to represent the District of Columbia?

Mr. BABCOCK. That is already provided for under the law, my dear sir.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What objection has the gentleman to putting it in here literally?

Mr. BABCOCK. The objection, I think, is this, Mr. Chairman. If the gentleman will listen to me for five minutes, I think he will understand it thoroughly. I want to explain how this form of a law came to be brought about. Numerous street-opening acts in the past have been attacked by property owners or those interested, and some acts were, I understand, set aside by the courts of the District of Columbia. The attorney for the District at that time, Mr. Duvall, and three Members of this House, two of them here at present and members of the Committee on the Judiciary, and one the chairman of that great committee, together with a very distinguished gentleman on the minority side of the House, Mr. COWHERD, of Missouri, formed a subcommittee of three, which was appointed by the District Committee to draft this very form of legislation.

That was some years ago. All the street-opening bills reported to the House then and since that time have been drawn in this form, word for word. They have gone before the courts of the District, they have been upheld, and every clause in this form of bill has been acted upon. One of the difficulties that the Commissioners experienced in street-opening cases was this—and I say this in reply to the criticism of the gentleman from Ohio—often when a man is dissatisfied with the decision or with the amount awarded him he could go in and stop the opening of a street a mile long indefinitely and hold up all the other property on that street, causing an immense amount of damage to individual owners. Congress has provided there shall be no stay, but he has a right to file exceptions to the award.

He can not under the present law or under the provisions of this bill stop the opening of a street.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. BABCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. FINLEY. I have read the bill, and I think that provision is entirely right, but there are some other matters that I wish to ask the gentleman about. What will be the cost of improvements after the condemnation proceedings are had?

Mr. BABCOCK. It will be very trifling. This is a very level strip of ground, almost on grade from one street to the other.

Mr. FINLEY. Will that include paving and the extension of water mains?

Mr. BABCOCK. Nothing in the way of sewerage or water, I think, but it will ultimately require paving and grading. The extension will take two lots now vacant.

Mr. FINLEY. About what will that cost?

Mr. BABCOCK. This committee does not deal with that, and I could hardly give an intelligent estimate; but the cost will be trifling. I should say perhaps the street would be 200 feet long and about 50 feet wide.

Mr. FINLEY. My reason for asking the gentleman is simply that this is the beginning of a project, and I think that the House ought to know what will be the ultimate cost of the improvement should we go into it—whether it will be reasonable or not; but if the gentleman does not know that, of course he can not answer it.

Mr. BABCOCK. There are gentlemen on this floor who could answer the question as to what it would cost to grade a street 200 feet long and 50 feet wide.

Mr. FINLEY. That is grading and paving?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman tell me this? I find here, on page 4, lines 9 and 10, the following:

> When the hearing is concluded, the jury, or a majority of them, shall return to said court, in writing, its verdict of the amount to be found due—and so forth. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman this: Is that not an unusual proposition—I do not mean here in the District of Columbia, but generally speaking—as to verdicts of juries?

Why the necessity for taking away unanimity in the conclusion of the jury and giving a majority verdict of a jury in a case like this? I would like to have some explanation of that.

Mr. BABCOCK. Well, I will say that this form of bill is the outgrowth of years and years of experience in the District of Columbia, and that the greater part of it has been drafted by the best legal minds and approved by the courts. Now, I am not a lawyer, and do not propose to get into any discussion of any legal questions involved.

Mr. FINLEY. If the gentleman will pardon me, I do not think my question involves a legal discussion, but as I understand all other verdicts here in the District of Columbia require unanimity on the part of the jury, and this permits a majority. Now, does the gentleman know whether or not this provision for a verdict of a majority of the jury applies to any other procedure in the District of Columbia than land-condemnation proceedings?

Mr. BABCOCK. I do not think it does apply to any except condemnation proceedings.

Mr. FINLEY. Then the gentleman knows of no reason why it should apply to this, except the practice and custom has grown up in the District of Columbia?

Mr. BABCOCK. Well, it is a practice that has been found to be necessary, and found to be efficient; and I do not think there has ever been a person appearing before the committee with any criticism as to the legal machinery of this form of bill. All concede that it has protected the rights of the District and of the property owners.

Mr. FINLEY. If the gentleman will pardon me, I will call his attention to the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Iowa this morning, who spoke of some very exorbitant verdicts that were rendered by juries operating under this provision of permitting a verdict by a majority.

Mr. BABCOCK. I do not think he was speaking of the opening of streets. I think he referred only to the ground taken for the site of an office building for the Senate, in which he stated the verdict was three times what it should have been. That will appeal to every gentleman of the House as not being, perhaps, an unusual thing in cases where the Government condemns ground for sites for public buildings.

Mr. FINLEY. In my half-dozen years here in the House I have heard the charge frequently made that the verdicts of juries in assessment cases were exorbitant.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say that it was shown at the time of the condemnation of the property across the river for a lunatic asylum that the only salvation of the District in the matter of condemnation was to require a verdict of the entire jury and not permit five or six men to get on a jury and join together to charge the Government more.

Mr. FINLEY. I am obliged to the gentleman from Ohio for his statement.

Mr. BABCOCK. In answer to that proposition, the gentleman is talking about an entirely different subject. That was a real-estate proposition, a speculative proposition. This is something demanded for the public, and for the public convenience. This proposed street extension does not relate to a speculative property, but is simply for the convenience of the people who live in that neighborhood and of the general public.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Why, Mr. Chairman, if there is one thing above all other things in the development of the District of Columbia that is speculative—and everybody knows it—it is the taking out of the pockets of the people of this District and of the country the money to open streets out in the country to develop and enhance the value of the outlying property there. The only public interest that grows up is after the speculator has despoiled the Treasury of the country.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that this proposed extension is not out in the country; it is hardly beyond the confines of Florida avenue—only about a thousand feet beyond that.

Mr. FINLEY. Would the gentleman have any objection to an amendment striking out this provision for a majority verdict on the part of the jury?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes, I would; because this provision has been found to work satisfactorily, and under it I do not think there is a single case of injustice that has been done either to the District or to the property owners. If there were I would be glad to yield for an amendment. But before the gentleman offers an amendment I desire to say that this form of law was prepared by three of the ablest lawyers in this body; that it has been used satisfactorily for years, and that a large number of bills identical in form with the one now under consideration have passed the House without debate or amendment. It has also been before the court several times, and its provisions were upheld. Before any amendment should be offered to that law its effect should certainly be very carefully considered.

Mr. FINLEY. This is not a general law of the District of Columbia affecting the general law of verdicts of juries, but simply applies to these procedures for the condemnation of lands, and we would not be amending any general law to require a unanimous verdict.

Mr. BABCOCK. Does the gentleman forget that this method has been in operation for years and years?

Mr. FINLEY. And during every year the attention of the House is called in the debates and statements made and figures given as to the exorbitant prices that have been obtained in this way, and numerous instances have been shown where it has not worked out to the best interests of the people of the District of Columbia or the Treasury; and that is what I have in mind, and what I wish to protect.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, just a word. If my friend from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] has a suit pending in one of the courts of the District of Columbia to recover the value of a horse and buggy, he must have the verdict of twelve men before he can get his money, although only twenty-five or fifty dollars may be involved; but when it comes to a question of taking the people's money and handing it over for the purposes for which we have enacted, you can get a majortiy of a jury to find a verdict. I say that is unfair.

Mr. FINLEY. A majority of seven men can do what otherwise requires twelve men.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Exactly.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Wisconsin will permit a question, I should like to ask one. I find that section 2 provides—

> That of the amount found to be due and awarded as damages for and in respect of the land condemned for extension of Kalorama road as herein provided, such amount thereof shall be assessed by the jury hereinafter provided for as benefits, and to the extent of such benefits, against those pieces or parcels of land on each side of said road as extended.

Section 5 provides—

> That if the use of a part only of any piece or parcel of ground shall be condemned, the jury in determining its value shall not take into consideration any benefits that may accrue to the remainder thereof—

What is the meaning of that?

Mr. PALMER. Read the rest of the section.

Mr. HEPBURN. Why hold out the idea that there is to be——

Mr. BABCOCK. Read it all.

Mr. HEPBURN (reading)— that may accrue to the remainder thereof from the extension of said road or highway, but such benefits shall be considered in determining what assessment shall be made on or against such part of such piece or parcel of land as may not be taken as hereinbefore provided.

Mr. BABCOCK. That answers the gentleman's question.

Mr. HEPBURN. No, it does not answer the gentleman's question. I want to know why you want that particular verbal juggling in there. Why should not these lands be considered just as the others are? Why do you make a special provision with regard to them, unless it be for the purpose of confusing and clouding the question that is to be submitted?

Mr. BABCOCK. Well, now——

Mr. HEPBURN. There is another question I should like to ask the gentleman. Why is it that he is so solicitous for the interest of these people who are on the opposite side of one of these parallel streets that is now cut off from access to the railroad by the location of this long strip of territory that he says intervenes, and that now compels these people to go around the end of it in order to get to the cars?

When they bought that property upon the opposite side of this long intervening strip of ground, did they not know of that situation and did they not get the benefit of it in the lower prices that they paid because of the inconvenience? And having selected that place, and being willing to submit themselves to the inconvenience for the sake of the compensation they had in the lower price, is it fair for them to come in now and say that the Government must wipe out this inconvenience and place their property in the condition of higher value that it would have been in when they bought their lands if this work had been completed at that time?

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the Clerk to read the letter of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia submitting this bill. That will answer many of the questions which have been asked by gentlemen.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE COMMISSIONERS DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, November 21, 1905.

DEAR SIR: The Commissioners of the District of Columbia have the honor to forward herewith draft of bill to authorize the extension of Kalorama road NW. from Eighteenth street to Champlain avenue, with request for its enactment.

A map is inclosed, showing in red the land necessary to be condemned for the extension, the estimated cost of which is $6,000. The alley shown on the plat was recently condemned under the provisions of a general law authorizing such condemnation, and the entire cost of opening same, together with the expense of the proceedings, was assessed on property benefited. It is only necessary now, in order to get the 50 feet proposed by the bill, to condemn a strip of land about 30 feet wide at one end and 34 feet at the other. The opening of this street is of extreme importance for the reason that in the long block between Eighteenth street and Champlain avenue and extending from Florida avenue to Columbia road, a distance of about 2,000 feet, there is no means of access from east to west, so that those living to the east are cut off from convenient aecess to the street-car connection to the west. This section of the District is rapidly building up, several houses having been built in the immediate vicinity of the proposed extension within the last year, and unless the land is condemned in a short time it will probably be built upon, which would of course increase the cost if it is determined to open such a street at a future date.

The bill proposes that not less than one-half of the amount awarded as damages should be assessed against the abutting property, the other half to be borne by general taxation. The reason for this provision in this case is that the alley having already been condemned, and the cost assessed entirely on abutting property, and the street being a convenient means of access to the general public as well as to those immediately adjacent, the Commissioners believe that it is only just and equitable that the general public should bear a portion of the expense of opening this street.

Very respectfully, HENRY B. F. MACFARLAND,
President Board of Commissioners District of Columbia.

Hon. J. W. BABCOCK,
Chairman Committee on the District of Columbia,
House of Representatives.

Mr. BABCOCK. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will ask for the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I should like to have the floor for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. BABCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Minnesota rise?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I should like to have the opportunity to say a word before the chairman of the committee closes debate.

Mr. BABCOCK. I yielded to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asked to be recognized and the gentleman from Wisconsin yielded.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, the letter of the Commissioners has thrown some additional light upon this subject, to the extent of showing that there is a general statute under which this condemnation can be had, as I assume, from the fact that it tells us that an alleyway that will form a part of this highway has already been condemned under the general statute.

Mr. BABCOCK. If the gentleman will permit me, I will explain that in just a word. The last Congress passed an act authorizing the Commissioners to open minor streets and alleys, and they have opened an alley there 20 feet wide. This is an addition of 30 feet in width, making a 50-foot street. They have no authority under the general statute for making it more than 20 feet wide.

Mr. HEPBURN. I understand the gentleman to say there is authority for opening minor streets and alleys?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is there a limit given to these streets?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes.

Mr. HEPBURN. Now, another point I want to make. In the opening of this inferior highway that would not be so beneficial—we have a right to assume—to the owners of this property, a mere alley, in order to have that convenience the property owners were compelled to meet with the entire expense. Now, when we propose to open a street that will have a frontage of more than 400 feet, making more valuable lots, why should we limit their contribution to one-half of this expense? In the expense of establishing the alley, where the benefit would be inconsiderable, they must pay all; here, where the special benefits are large, where there will be a frontage of 400 feet, they are to bear only one-half of the expense. Is there equity or justice in that?

Mr. BABCOCK. There is equity and justice because it is a great public benefit.

Mr. HEPBURN. A public benefit! It is a public benefit to those persons who bought their lots on the side of this parallel street that is cut off now from the free and easy access to the street railway, these gentlemen who have had the benefit of this isolated position that they selected for the lesser price, we assume, that they paid for their lots. Having had that, they now propose that the Government shall pay for these improvements that would place their property in a position that it would be in when it is no longer subject to this disability that resulted in the depreciated price that they were the beneficiaries of. A great public benefit! Does it extend, will this contemplated street extend, back to create a great thoroughfare? Surely not. It simply takes a piece of property that lies in front of property of a few persons who will be the beneficiaries for an alleged public use.

Mr. BABCOCK. It does extend the benefits to the public.

Mr. HEPBURN. If it were a part or would form a part of a great thoroughfare, that would be one thing; but after you get this street, if they want the benefit of a public thoroughfare, the gentleman will come here compelling the people who travel in that vicinity to traverse this road whether they want to or not, or whether it will be a convenience or otherwise. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe in this kind of legislation. I do not want any more streets about the city of Washington until we have better streets. I do not want the duty imposed on the Commissioners of surfacing vast areas of the country here in the District until they can properly surface those streets that we now have jurisdiction over, and which they ought in some way to make passable and comfortable.

Mr. BABCOCK. I now yield to my colleague on the committee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, with reference to the criticism that has been made on the extension of streets cut through unimproved country being paid out of revenues for the District, and asphalted, and improvement made, etc., I feel as strongly against that as does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] or the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]. Perhaps something of that sort has been done in the past; I do not know. But because something of that sort has been done that was wrong, should this House stand here and refuse to make needed improvements simply on that account? There is a street-car line running up and down Eighteenth street that brings hundreds and thousands of people to the city and back to the country, or to that portion through which the cars run.

Kalorama avenue comes along at right angles and intersects Eighteenth street, so that the people living on Eighteenth street have Kalorama avenue to come down. The people in Champlain avenue, which runs parallel with Eighteenth street, have no way of getting out of it without going away round the end of the block, and it makes it almost inaccessible. Here is a small piece of property—if gentlemen can see these red lines on the map that I hold up—there is a small portion between Eighteenth and Champlain avenue, 34 feet at one end and 30 at the other. If purchased now, while it is vacant, it will open Kalo-rama avenue down to Champlain avenue so that people can come through to this street car line without going around out of the way. Now, after that property, which is now vacant, is built upon, the necessity for opening this street will be greater in the future than it is now, and after it is opened it will cost three or four times as much as it will now. To condemn that property now will cost $6,000. This bill provides that one-half shall come out of the property owners and the other half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia. Gentlemen will remember that no part of that is provided by the United States Government. The people of the District of Columbia are benefited as well as those who happen to own this vacant piece of property. Now, gentlemen will notice that lots are laid off fronting Champlain avenue and Eighteenth street. Consequently, the improvement to this vacant property here when this is taken off will not equal what it would if these vacant properties abutted on a great street like this street car line occupies. Consequently, it is inequitable to take from the owners of these two vacant pieces, who had already furnished the 20-foot alleyway, the entire cost of opening that street that they have no particular interest in. The owner of this lot fronts on Eighteenth street, and the owner of that block on the east side fronts Champlain. Therefore, they can not possibly be benefited individually and personally as much as the public who want to go through to Champlain, and the public on Champlain and east, in order to go through to this street car line. I have never seen in the District of Columbia a street-opening proposition that had more equity in proportion to the cost than this has.

As to the general condemnation laws of the District, I am not here to defend or commend them. It is only up to the committee as to what we are going to do with this identical bill. Are you going to refuse a large number of people a needed convenience because the law may have been, in some instances in the past, abused? Now, it is true that when this street is opened, or these condemnation proceedings take place and dedication is authorized, then the city will improve by asphalting or otherwise, and that expense comes out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and also out of the half paid by the Government, as I understand it. Therefore, to that extent, the General Treasury is indirectly interested in such improvements as they may make in the way of paving hereafter. But that is done and has to be authorized or paid for by separate authorization, and so far as this bill goes, we do not provide how it shall be improved, whether the street shall be asphalted or paved in some other way. We simply authorize the opening of a street which is as much needed as I can conceive could possibly be anywhere in the District of Columbia.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What has been the observation of the gentleman, who is now on the District Committee, with reference to the oppressive prices that the Government, either the District of Columbia or the United States, has had to pay in these condemnation proceedings?

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman have reference to condemnation proceedings by the Government for public buildings?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes; or any other public concern. We will say a public building.

Mr. SIMS. These streets here are paid for by the city and not by the Government.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understand. That is indirectly the Government of the United States.

Mr. SIMS. No; we do not directly or indirectly contribute to it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The revenues come out of the District of Columbia to pay for these street improvements. What has been the gentleman's observation with reference to, say, land for public buildings?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I never have had an opportunity to observe but one instance and that was the case of the condemnation of the property on which the office building for the House is being built.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What has been the gentleman's observation?

Mr. SIMS. I never have bought or sold any property in Washington. I never priced it, but from the price paid in the case referred to I thought those people got in a commercial way every cent that they ought to have had and perhaps more. But there is something to consider besides the mere market value of the property when you go in and take a man's home from him and deprive him of it and put him in the way of being compelled to hunt up another place and make the best bargain he can for it. There is something in the nature of damages in such a case outside of the commercial value. He may easily get a great deal less than he would have been willing to take for it, whether in the nature of a home or a homestead.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman know whether any appeals were taken in these cases?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; I think there were many appeals taken.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. By whom?

Mr. SIMS. Well, exceptions to the report, which are in the nature of an appeal.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. By whom?

Mr. SIMS. The property owners.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Was any lawyer there, any United States district attorney, or any law official, representing the District of Columbia—representing the Government or District of Columbia—in making these condemnations?

Mr. SIMS. Well, the District of Columbia had no interest in it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I put my proposition both ways.

Mr. SIMS. And the property owners were the only ones interested——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Was there any United States district attorney there?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I do not know just how the proceedings were taken—whether the Attorney-General of the United States or an assistant district attorney or an attorney of the United States was present. I do not know how the interests of the Government were protected in detail, but I know they were protected.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Protected how?

Mr. SIMS. Why, that the Government was properly represented.

Mr. BABCOCK. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. BABCOCK. I want to say in connection with that that an attorney is detailed by the Commissioners specifically to look after street openings—Mr. Sinclair. I understand the Appropriations Committee appropriates especially for his salary and he is detailed.

Mr. SIMS. He is the assistant district attorney, but the gentleman from Tennessee was asking about this office building. Now, I want to ask you if you can see any objection whatever to this bill?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to say to my colleague that the main trouble is because the bill was not explained at first. Then the second trouble is that there is a general objection to the bill because of the general nature of it. It does not seem to guard the interests of the public, whether it is the District of Columbia or the Government of the United States, as thoroughly as it should. For instance, it provides seven jurors. Now, I understand they can condemn land possibly without any jury, but then that is not fair, that is not just.

Mr. SIMS. Does my colleague recognize the necessity for that improvement?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, I do not know anything about real estate in Washington.

Mr. SIMS. Do you not recognize the necessity of it, as explained to you?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I confess to my friend I am a little bit prejudiced against it because it is out on the edge of town. I have seen so much of paving and asphalting and guttering out on the edge of my beautiful city, which you love as well as myself, while our streets in the very heart of the city were in holes, so I confess I am somewhat prejudiced in this case.

Mr. SIMS. There is no use getting away from this question.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am showing you——

Mr. SIMS. Eighteenth street is highly improved, Champlain avenue is improved and Kalorama is improved, and there is this little connection in the heart of a thickly settled portion of this city on Washington Heights. It is not in the suburbs; it is not out of the town, but it is in a place where property is as high in value almost as any part of Washington City.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You mean high in value?

Mr. SIMS. Yes, sir; and the trouble is that——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Do you think this work ought to be done by seven jurors—this work of condemnation?

Mr. SIMS. I think, as to condemnation proceedings, they ought to proceed in the interest of the public as rapidly as possible.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, that does not answer the question.

Mr. SIMS. I do not propose to wait now and change the general law in order to get this bill passed.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You say specifically in the bill seven jurors, and that five can make a report and condemn a man's property. You can try with seven and decide with five.

Mr. SIMS. It seems, Mr. Chairman, neither the owners of the property nor the public nor the District of Columbia have in any way objected to this, and only those have objected——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. They have no representative in the House, and we are, as I said a while ago, the common council of the city of Washington. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] protested against this form; the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] protested, and I am trying my best to do it myself.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, this matter was considered by the committee. Not a mortal man in the District of Columbia offered one objection to it or made any criticism whatever, and it is highly recommended by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Who ever heard of it while it was being considered by the committee? What did you know about it? Who had heard there was such a bill pending?

Mr. SIMS. It was introduced like any other bill introduced into this House.

Mr. GROSVENOR. How many witnesses appeared before the committee?

Mr. SIMS. There was not one.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Exactly like the process by which we got protection for the poor street-car drivers. The committee came in and reported a bill which did not compel the street railroads to protect the motormen, and said that none had appeared before the committee. I made an investigation, and found they were afraid to appear before the committee for fear they would lose their jobs.

I asked a number myself and took their names. That is why they did not appear before the committee. It seems there were no persons who appeared before the committee in this matter.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Does the gentleman think anybody was afraid to appear?

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman think that the property owners were afraid to appear?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The property owners ought to have a chance to appear here.

Mr. SIMS. Suppose they do not know about it?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I can suggest to the gentleman how.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. They know that the bills are pending, and if they do not like them they can appear before the committee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Have any of them appeared?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. No.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then how does the gentleman know?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. It is a simple procedure that has been going on for a long while.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then why reenact it? Why reenact a proceeding here and leave out the proposed amendment—the gentleman even refused to agree to an amendment to the bill providing for a city attorney to represent the District of Columbia there—why do you reenact the old law and leave out a provision about a city representative being required to represent the District of Columbia?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I assume that one of the attorneys connected with the District government is always here, one especially detailed.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Not a single man in this debate has said that there is a single representative to represent the District of Columbia or the United States in any of these proceedings.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. If my brother will pardon me, I will say that if I were going to prepare that law to practice under in Michigan I would have provided for twelve jurors.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why would the gentleman have twelve jurors?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Because that is our practice there. They are entirely satisfied to have a majority here.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I think the House is convinced by this time that the opposition to this bill it not specific, but general, and I can not see any use in wasting more time of the committee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to waste a little more time in looking out for the hereafter.

Mr. SIMS. I decline to waste any more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] is recognized.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] will give me a little more time. I want to be heard for a few moments. I will be brief.

Mr. BABCOCK. I will yield to the gentleman in a minute. I promised to yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield to me then?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. All right.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] now.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, if the House will indulge me for just a few moments I would like to say a few words not only concerning this bill, but concerning other measures of a similar character which have passed heretofore, and some which will probably be urged for passage during the present session of Congress. The bill now under discussion is almost identical with those that have previously passed the Congress. I hold in my hand a bill (H. R. 17585) introduced during the third session of the Fifty-eighth Congress by the present chairman of the committee [Mr. BABCOCK]. It is a bill authorizing the extension of Rhode Island avenue NE. The provisions of that bill, although it never became a law, are almost identical with the provisions of the present bill under discussion. As the chairman said, the bill now under discussion is the bill that received the greatest favor, at least during the last session of Congress. I will read, on the subject of expense, section 10 of the bill, previously introduced at the third session of the Fifty-eighth Congress, as follows:

> That the sum of $300 is hereby appropriated to provide the necessary funds for the costs and expenses of the condemnation proceedings taken pursuant hereto, one-half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and the other half out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

That, as I am informed, is the character of the bills that have passed this Congress for years and years previous to the Fifty-eighth Congress. In other words, that the Government of the United States was to pay one-half of the expense of the condemnation proceedings for the opening of any new street or roads within the District of Columbia.

During the last session some members of the Committee on the District of Columbia, of which I was then a member, but of which I am not at the present time, objected to that portion of the bill, and it was changed to read as follows:

> That the sum of $300 is hereby appropriated, out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, to provide the necessary funds for the costs and expenses of the condemnation proceedings taken pursuant hereto.

You will notice from the reading of the bill that the costs and expenses are taken out of the revenues of the District of Columbia instead of half out of the revenues of the United States and half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BABCOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes, sir.

Mr. BABCOCK. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, it has been the policy of Congress for years, one that has been fought out and decided on this floor before Congress was honored by the presence of the gentleman from Minnesota, that in all street-opening matters the entire expense should be borne by the District or city property, and that the bill the gentleman is reading from is such as was sent to me officially, all of them containing a clause that one-half of the expense be paid by the General Government.

Now, if the bill that has been reported by the committee has that provision it was a clerical error. The clerk of the committee informs me that all street-opening acts are in accordance with the policy of this House and committee—that is, that the entire expense should be borne by the District of Columbia.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Then, Mr. Chairman, my information is wrong. Still, I do not doubt, I do not like to doubt the chairman's word; but my information, positive and direct, upon the subject is that that was the way until the Fifty-eighth Congress, when the form of the bill was changed, so that the property owners should pay a portion and the District the other portion. But my information is, and I shall still believe that to be correct until proof is presented to me, that previous to the Fifty-seventh or Fifty-eighth Congress all bills that passed this House were to the effect that the Government of the United States should pay one-half of the condemnation proceedings on any land in the District of Columbia. Mr. Chairman, where do you get information about the District from if you can not get it from the chairman of the committee? I go to the Committee on the District of Columbia itself, where the information was given to me, because I objected to the proposition saying that where a man's land was benefited he should not receive damages at the expenses of the Government. An agitation was then had, and this new form of bill gotten up. I was one of the subcommittee that reported it to the committee.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I understood you to say the District of Columbia?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The District of Columbia Committee. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not know what the meaning of these lines are which I read from section 10:

That the sum of $300 is hereby appropriated out of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

It has been my understanding heretofore that the revenues of the District of Columbia were made up of taxes collected by direct taxation and an amount equal to the estimated revenues of the District was placed there by the Government of the United States. If I am wrong about that I certainly desire to be corrected.

Mr. BABCOCK. If the gentleman will look at the report submitted to Congress, he will find that these specific amounts are paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and not out of the Government Treasury.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Will the gentleman tell me what constitutes the revenues of the District?

Mr. BABCOCK. Moneys raised from licenses and taxes on real and personal property in the District. The annual supply bill is handled by the Committee on Appropriations. When they bring in District of Columbia appropriation bills they appropriate for current expenses of the District government, to be paid one-half out of the United States Treasury and one-half out of the District of Columbia revenues, or to be paid entirely out of the District revenues, in some instances.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I am seeking information, and when I do that I generally go to the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia on all matters pertaining to the District, because his greater experience enables him to answer all questions. But my understanding is that there are but two sources of raising revenue to supply the District government, one by taxes and licenses in the District proper, the other, an equal amount which the Government of the United States added, which put together constituted the revenues of the District of Columbia for all purposes.

Mr. Chairman, the bill up for consideration, while I do not approve of some features of it, still I wish to say that it is the least offensive of any street-opening bill that I have seen during three sessions of Congress. It is the least offensive in this regard, that the public is more benefited by the provisions of this bill in proportion to the length of the street that is opened than by any other bill for a street of equal length. Usually these bills extend for blocks—I believe sometimes half a mile—and into territory that is not very well built up. Hence, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] says, it certainly savors of real-estate speculation rather than the public benefit.

The bill under consideration I am familiar with, at least partially. It was introduced in the third session of the Fifty-eighth Congress, but never got out of committee. I wish to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], who says he personally went over the route, what length of territory is proposed to be opened?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. The gentleman from Tennessee does not appear to be here, but the chairman has passed over the ground, and I have no doubt that he can give you the information.

Mr. BABCOCK. Two hundred feet.

Mr. HEPBURN. That is the length of the street?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes; 200 feet.

Mr. HEPBURN. What is the other length of it?

Mr. BABCOCK. The block is about half a mile long; it is something like 2,000 feet.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. This bill is less offensive than any bill of its nature that I have ever seen, because it is apparent from this—I think the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] has made it plain—that the public generally will be benefited and to a greater extent than is usually the case in street-extension bills.

Mr. Chairman, there is a provision in every one of these bills that no property except that fronting upon the street, and only a small portion of that, shall be assessed for benefits. Ordinarily, under all condemnation laws in the different States with which I am familiar the property benefited by the location of a public ditch or highway, whether it absolutely touches it or not, usually has to share in the burden of taxation. That is one objection to this form of bill, but in this particular case the distance is so small that I think we ought not to quibble simply for the purpose of defeating it.

Mr. Chairman, a proceeding is provided in this bill, and I think it is universal in proceedings of this kind in this District, that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall institute proceedings in the supreme court of the District for the purposes of this condemnation; that a notice shall be published for a certain length of time; that upon the expiration of that time, upon proof of due publication and notice, the court shall direct the marshal to subpœna a jury of seven men to hear, try, and determine the matters in issue in this condemnation. After receiving evidence they assess the benefits and the damages. I agree with the gentleman from Iowa, and I have heretofore contended that the two methods employed, namely, in assessing only a part of the benefits at one time, which is in the nature of a juggle, and another matter which I am about to refer to, should be corrected. I have repeatedly attempted to get that done, but unsuccessfully, and I am glad that the gentleman has referred to the matter.

Mr. Chairman, after the verdict of the jury is rendered—and a majority of the seven jurors may find a verdict—what then happens? There follows a very peculiar proceeding, in my judgment. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia may, in their discretion, reject the award and assessment of said jury and all proceedings thereunder shall be null and void. In other words, if the verdict of that jury does not suit the Commissioners, who are not a court, but laymen—if it does not suit the Commissioners they may in their discretion set it aside. Therefore, this verdict of the jury is a farce. You might as well submit it to the Commissioners of the District without the trouble and expense of impaneling a jury at $5 per day. When the proper time comes I propose to move to strike out of line 16 the words "may in their discretion" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "shall;" so that it will read "shall reject the award and assessment of said jury."

If the law is to remain as written here, I should like to inquire what is the necessity for the verdict of a jury. In all orderly proceedings in court, after the trial of a case the judge, upon proper case made, on an application for a new trial, may set aside the verdict for various reasons: First, because it is contrary to the evidence; second, that it is contrary to law; but under this peculiar jugglery of words—I get that expression from the gentleman from Iowa, and I am much obliged to him for it—they have a farce of a trial by jury, a verdict which may be rendered by four out of seven men, and then the Commissioners may, in their discretion, set it aside if it does not suit them. There is no appeal from that. The only appeal provided is a technical appeal upon questions of law alone, where objection is made. You can not review the facts except by submission to another similar jury. It is wholly within the discretion of the District Commissioners, and that ought to be remedied.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Does not this procedure seem to be quite satisfactory to the people here?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The gentleman from Michigan has asked me a pertinent question. I will say that while a member of the District Committee I have never heard anybody object to it. I do not know whether they know of the proceeding or not, but I can say to the gentleman for his information that a very reliable gentleman on the outside, one who is not a Member of Congress, informed me very recently that it was only a favored few who got street extensions in the District of Columbia, and that other portions which had no influence could never get any.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I want to ask my brother if he was not a member of that committee during the last Congress?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes; I was a member of that committee, and I objected to 90 per cent of all these street extensions, and you laid over several of them because I did object.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Do you know of anybody during the Fifty-eighth Congress who wanted to be heard before that committee upon street-opening cases who did not have an opportunity?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I never heard of anybody asking to be heard.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. You never did?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Never on these matters.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I have been listening to this colloquy and I am anxious to find out where in the world this committee gets so much information and reports so many extensions if no one comes before the committee to ask for them.

Mr. BABCOCK. I can answer that question, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Minnesota will allow me.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I will yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BABCOCK. The property owners always appear before the Commissioners of the District, sitting as a board of commissioners, and the Commissioners make a report to the Committee on the District of Columbia, which report is considered final unless some of the interested parties request a hearing. If no request is made, the committee takes it for granted that no one wishes to be heard further.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I am obliged to the gentleman from Tennessee for asking the question, and to the chairman of the committee for answering it, because, as I said, I never knew of a property owner to appear before the committee and object to any of these street extensions when I was a member of the committee. I now ascertain that the Commissioners sit somewhere in the District, get up hearings unbeknown to Congress, the residents appear before them, and then the Commissioners report the result to the District Committee.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Why should Congress be bothered with these hearings? Why is not that a proper action?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Why should not the District of Columbia be governed like other cities?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. There is no reason why, if a property owner desires, he should not go before the District Committee and be heard in person if he wishes.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Is there anything in the bill or report which shows that the property owner or anybody did appear before the committee or Commissioners?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. No. Did the gentleman ever see a bill in a State legislature that showed who appeared before the committees at the preliminary hearings?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnsota. Oh, no.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Then there is no reason why this bill should show it, and there is no reason why any property holder who wishes should not, either by himself or by his attorney, appear before the District Committee if he so desires.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, this simply carries out my view, and I am glad that I am getting the information now that this city is run almost directly by three Commissioners and not by the citizens or by Congress. It now appears here that the ipse dixit of these Commissioners is sufficient for the committee to report upon and for Congress to act. That is the way it appears at the present time; that is the way I thought it was when I was on the committee, but I never obtained the information before.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman find any provision in the bill for the District of Columbia to appeal from this proceeding?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I do not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And yet the revenues of the District of Columbia are trenched upon to pay a part of these expenses.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. It would seem so.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And yet they have no appeal from the condemnation proceedings.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, as I say, I am not particularly objecting to this bill except upon principle. But, Mr. Chairman, there is another question that I do object to, and have strenuously objected to ever since I have had the honor to be a Member of Congress. I do not think, however, that this discussion will result in much good in that direction, but it seems to me that it is a question that Congress ought some time in the future to take in hand and deal with as it should be. The question is this: I know of no municipality, no city or government in the United States, where property is taken and condemned for street purposes, or where the streets, after having been located and laid out, are ordered to be paved with brick or with asphalt, or where there is a sewer laid in front of it, that the property itself does not at least carry a large proportion of the expense for that improvement per front foot. If there is any government or municipality in the United States that is not charged with that burden to some extent, if there is a Member on the floor that knows of such a city, I would like to have it made known.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that that is the way that all cities are governed in this respect. I know of no reason why now in this city the property owner who has property that is improved many fold by the location of a street in front of it, or by having it asphalted, or by the putting down of a sewer whereby it is enhanced in value—I know of no reason why that property should not be held to pay a part of the expense.

Now, take this particular bill. If it is passed, the District Commissioners will, under the law, open this street or they will order it to be opened, and next year, or possibly during this session, you will find before this House an item in the general appropriation bill appropriating money for the District of Columbia—a sum from ten to twenty thousand dollars—for the purpose of asphalting or paving this particular street. Who pays that expense? The United States pays one-half of it and the District of Columbia pays the other half, and the owners of the lots and property do not pay a dollar. That, to my mind, is the worst possible principle that is involved in the street extension and the improvements in the city of Washington. This city is the only place of which I have any knowledge on earth where property that is largely benefited many times its present value does not contribute anything toward paving the streets in front of it. Millions of dollars of this Government have gone to pave streets out in various portions of this District upon the plea of the public good, that simply, in my judgment, was for the purpose of enhancing the value of real estate owners who own large tracts of land in the vicinity.

That is the principle that I war against; that is the principle that I object to—extending a street six, eight, or ten blocks out into almost unimproved territory, knowing that in the near future Congress will be called upon through its Appropriation Committee to appropriate hundreds of thousands of dollars for asphalting and paving that street. That is my main objection to the system here. These condemnation proceedings, while they have stood the test of the courts, would not be endured for one moment in any municipality in the United States outside of the District of Columbia.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is a small bill and, as I have said in the beginning, the least objectionable of any bill that I have seen emanating from the District of Columbia Committee. Therefore, I myself shall vote for this bill, but reserve the right hereafter to express my opinion and vote the other way when I think that it is a real estate transaction instead of one for the public good.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this debate has already taken up so much time that I shall not undertake to discuss this bill fully, and shall only make a few suggestions that I utter for the purpose not so much of amending this present bill as that the committee may think along the lines I suggest in the future. One of the propositions that is fundamentally erroneous in this bill and absolutely wrong is this: That they charge up benefits in common to the abutting owner. They should charge the abutting owner with a special benefit. The abutting owner has already paid for a good highway when he pays his taxes. For instance, I own a lot, I pay taxes, and the city comes along and builds a highway in front of that lot without hurting the grade at all, without hurting me whatever. I have already paid for that in paying my taxes to the city government; but if it comes along and there is a big sink hole in front of my property, and they cover that up and make the highway perfectly safe, why, I would say that possibly might be a special benefit; or if the house were so situated that you could not get down to the road, and they made some adjustment in making the street which I have already paid for in my taxes, by which I can get in and out of my house, why, that would be a special benefit. But where, as it seems to me is suggested in this bill throughout, you simply come in and make a street in front of A B's house, and then charge him up with the benefit of making that street in front of his house, when he has already paid for making that street when he has paid his taxes, that makes him pay twice for it. Now, that is a precedent that is not just; it is not good law; it is bad policy; and yet it is throughout this whole bill. The words "special benefit" are not alluded to or taken into consideration in this bill; and for the future edification of the distinguished committee that reports this bill I shall refer them to a very noted case decided a number of years ago in my own State, the case of Woodfolk v. Railroad, where that exact question came up.

There they undertook to build a railroad in front of a man's house and cut off his property and paid him for it in benefits. His house was near the battlefield that my distinguished friends from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] and Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] helped to make a number of years ago at Nashville. It destroyed his property and the railroad tried to pay him off in benefits. They appealed the case, and Judge Carruthers, one of our great jurists, for the whole supreme court, said you can not pay him in benefits in common, you must pay him in money; if you specially benefit him then charge him up with that, but you can not take his land and pay him in benefits. In short, do not charge him taxes to build the street and when you build it burden him with benefits growing out of making a good street in front of his house. He paid his taxes to get that kind of street. This bill burdens the abutting owner with benefits in common and taxes, too, to get what his taxes entitle him to have. Lewis on Eminent Domain, and other authorities, cite this Woodfold case as a leading authority on this point.

Now, there is no right of appeal in this bill that I can find, and I called on my distinguished friend the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON] to look through the bill, and he can not find any appeal. On the contrary, you will find at the end of the bill a provision that blocks or rather prevents an appeal. I believe that is the way my friend from Pennsylvania construes it.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I have not read the bill through.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. None of us have had a chance to do that. These bills are heaped in on us just like taking a pitchfork and throwing hay off a wagon. No chance to know. No chance to study. This bill was reported on January 4th—this in the 8th.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the gentleman if he has read section 11 of the bill, that contemplates appeal as a matter of course and provides that such appeals shall not delay the proceedings?

Mr. GAINES of Tennesseee. That is what I said just now.

Mr. FINLEY. Then, as I take it, the right of appeal is not taken away by the bill. It is recognized here in section 11 that there is a right of appeal.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, it is very doubtful. You have some doubt about it, and I am satisfied my friend on my right has some doubt, and I have doubt. Gentlemen, unless you give the right of appeal on the merits of the case injustice may be done. In some States no appeal is allowed; they let the twelve jurors settle the matter, and whatever they adjudge, why, that practically settles it. Now, there is no provision here for an appeal on the merits. Some one has suggested there is possibly a technical appeal on questions of law or errors of law. There are seven jurors to sit here. They do not know anything about the law, and the chances are they will exclude testimony that ought to be included, and unless you have an attorney there to represent the District of Columbia the District of Columbia will be prejudiced, and unless the abutting owners have their lawyers there they will be prejudiced. You turn the suits over to seven jurors and let five of them settle that without giving any right of appeal to a jury of twelve men, which they ought to have, when you undertake to take any man's property away from him, whether he lives in a log cabin or in a mansion. That is the moral law. Whether we have any Constitution or not, whether we have any statutes or not, the moral law, upon which all our laws are built, says a man is entitled to just compensation.

I remember reading away back in some Turkish history where they wanted to build a sewer, I believe. All the people gave the right of way except one man, and he did not give it possibly because he was a poor man. He said, "No, that is my property, and I can not give it away;" and the ruler of that country called his lawmaking body together and appropriated just compensation for him and took the land. That was in a heathen country where there was no constitution, and that is the law of this country, and the courts here uphold it. Here, gentlemen, you are fixing to take the people's property, yet there is not a word appearing here that a single, solitary man has been before this committee and asked for this proposed law—not one. It developed in the course of a colloquy here that somebody had come before the District of Columbia Commissioners here. How many Commissioners were present? One, a minority, or a majority? Is that a board of condemnation? It certainly can be a board of recommendation. There may be no objection to this bill further than pointed out, and what I have said may not be tenable, as I have not had a chance to investigate, it being a long bill, etc., but this thing of going along here and making laws for the District of Columbia because A B down town has seen the committee or because the Commissioners recommend it, without giving the people of this District a chance to be heard before the committee is wrong.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Let me tell this and then I will yield.

I want again, Mr. Chairman, to allude to this street-car matter. I do not know whether my friend from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] was here or not, but the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] was here and he reported the bill. They said the reason why they did not give a covering out in front to protect the street-car driver, or motorman, was because they did not have room to get the street cars in the street-car shed if a vestibule was put on the car. They had room enough for the poor fellow out in the graveyard, but they did not have room enough in the street-car shed for a vestibuled car. It was contended that these poor street-car fellows did not want this vestibule because they did not come up here and appear before the committee. As I say, I felt sorry for these poor people, and I got on every car I could and asked the motorman if he was in favor of these vestibules. Why, all said, "Of course we are." I said, "You are?" "Yes." Then I asked, "Why did you not go before the committee?" They said, "We dared not go because we were afraid we would lose our jobs." I think that was so in every case. I took a little book in my pocket, and took the names down of the men. Now, here we are opening this street. My colleague [Mr. SIMS] says it is all right. My friend over here [Mr. DAVIS] says it is a little bit of a thing; better let it go this time; but how do you know, gentlemen, that you are not outraging some poor little Turk out on that street, who does not know the way even to the House, like the driver who brought me up here this morning. Now, that is true. If he was in Tennessee he would vote the Republican ticket.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I would like to ask the gentleman why he claims that these people have not the right to be heard, when they have the right to appear before three Commissioners of this District, who are able gentlemen, and if they do not get a fair hearing there, they can appear before the District Committee. I have been a member of the latter committee for two or three Congresses, and I have yet to know the time when the humblest citizen in this District did not have the fullest right to be heard before that committee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will tell the gentleman. The men on that committee do not give them a chance. You do it so quickly. You are fine business men, and you draw up bills one day and report them here the next day.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. The gentleman is drawing on his fertile imagination just now.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do not mean to reflect upon the committee. I am talking about the swiftness with which the gentlemen resolve themselves into a mayor and common council for this District. The people hardly know how to legislate in this place. They leave it all to us. It is not the business of the Commissioners to see that legislation of this sort is passed without giving the people that are to be benefited or damaged a chance to be heard by the committee that draws the bill that takes their little home and turns them out into the street.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK]?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. BABCOCK. I desire to say to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES], Mr. Chairman, that no request for a hearing before the District Committee has ever been ignored, or no bill has ever been reported by that committee as long as there was a request there for hearing from the humblest citizen of the District.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I have not any doubt but that the gentlemen would hear the humblest citizen in this District, Mr. Chairman, but as a matter of fact neither the humble nor the exalted have been before the committee in this case.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Is not that the best proof that they are satisfied—the fact that they have not appeared before the committee?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Take the street-car case. Afterwards we raised a row here in the House about turning the people out to the ravages of that horrible snow. I remember it was several feet deep. I saw those poor men with frozen hands and unprotected. We raised a row here in the House and that bill was taken back to the committee. They heard the people, and we got the vestibuled cars.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. The gentleman does not think that is a parallel case to this, does he—the case of a man working for a corporation?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is a worse case with those poor fellows who do not have where to lay their heads, possibly.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman tell us who is going to be injured in this District if they appear before the committee and let their wants be known?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why do you not give them the chance in here when the time comes?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. They know when the District Committee meets.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman is recommending a bill here to require some sort of a court for the property owners when they proceed to take their property, and yet there is not a single bit of testimony here that a single abutting owner, a single citizen, has come to the committee and asked the committee to enact this bill or this particular kind of a bill.

Mr. SIMS. In this kind of a case, where the Commissioners have recommended and where there is no objection filed by anybody, will the gentleman please tell us who he would send for to interrogate?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. My colleague from Tennessee has not given the people a chance. He has admitted that not a single man has been before the District Committee. How does he know that they want this particular bill? How does he know that they want any bill?

Mr. SIMS. I deny emphatically that the dear people have not had a day in court.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How does the gentleman know? Has he been out to see these men?

Mr. SIMS. The bill was introduced. It was published and printed, and every man that wanted it could get a copy of it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman has to send his speeches to his constituents, and they are printed. I hope he will send some of his speeches to his people, and to mine too.

Mr. SIMS. My constituents seem to get along better without my speeches than they do with them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this committee is accused of not giving the people a chance.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is hoped that you are going to do so.

Mr. SIMS. What will we do? Sit down and write each one a letter?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Who asked the committee to introduce this bill?

Mr. SIMS. The Commissioners.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How does the gentleman know that? The Commissioners said it, but I want the people to say it.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman makes a pretty serious charge when he says that the committee has denied the people the right to be heard.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I have not said that.

Mr. SIMS. I know the gentleman will not say it, because it is not a fact. We endeavor to give everybody in this District an opportunity, because they do not enjoy the benefit of having a Member on this floor to represent them.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Do you personally know that the abutting owners know that this bill has been introduced?

Mr. SIMS. I did not ask any of them if they did and never will be foolish enough to ask them such a question. I will not presume that the abutting owners do not know when a public bill has been introduced, has passed through the committee where hearings have been had on it, that they do not know it. I have not found any man that is interested that did not seem to know it and know the justice and equity of it. I think the gentleman is not entirely serious when he says that the committee were engaged in a star-chamber proceeding.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I did not say that.

Mr. SIMS. I have heard the people of the District of Columbia until I am worn out hearing them. Still I say that no man shall be denied a hearing so long as I am on the committee if I can prevent it. We hear them in our committee, at our private residences; they come to us through letter and by organization, and I have never heard anywhere that a hearing has been denied them.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do not believe that my colleague would do the slightest injustice to anybody, but the trouble is that when the gentleman gets down to the District Committee his information ceases. He says the Commissioners have asked for it; but I asked him who asked the Commissioners, and he says he does not know. I asked him if he had been out at this place and seen any of the people who are interested in this, and it appears there is not a single man who has been over the locality or knows anything about it.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Oh, no; the gentleman is mistaken when he says that nobody has been out on the part of the committee. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] was over the ground.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I asked my colleague if he had been out there to see these people.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. He did not go to the people.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How do you know he has been out there?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Because I heard him say so.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will ask my colleague and friend again if he has ever been out there and located the premises?

Mr. SIMS. I have been out there and passed over this property. I have not located any premises, because there are no premises. I looked over the ground where Kalorama avenue comes into Eighteenth street and where this extension will be. In all candor, I have never seen a proposition for opening a street better than this one.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Did you see any of the people who owned this property?

Mr. SIMS. I did not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Do you know any member of this committee who saw the property owners?

Mr. SIMS. I did not go and ask them.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is a great plea for a great Congress, legislating for a people who are stripped of the right of suffrage as these people are. Think of me undertaking to introduce a bill in the common council of Nashville (for we are the common council of Washington) chaining my people's hands and they not knowing a word about it.

Why, Mr. Chairman, bills are not introduced, as a rule, unless somebody comes and asks that it be done, and there is not a single individual, as the record shows, who has asked for the passage of this law. That is the point of the criticism I am making.

Mr. BABCOCK. Just one moment there. I want to explain to the gentleman from Tennessee that the demand is universal with the people living in that neighborhood, and I believe that they would not impose on the Commissioners or the committee or think for a moment they would permit that to be done.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Are the people living along this road asking for this?

Mr. BABCOCK. There are no people living on this road. It is people living adjacent to it—the people in the neighborhood.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman from Tennessee permit me a question?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. Does the gentleman know how many owners there are of this property through which this extension will go?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that he has had every chance I have had of getting information about this.

Mr. FINLEY. I am sure of that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. So far as has been shown, there is not a single owner of this property that has ever asked for the passage of this law, and the only authority for it is the request of the Commissioners. They are not here. The bill has been presented here without the consent of one of the abutting owners, and yet here is a bill that comes in without any right of appeal, providing a jury of seven, and that five men may pass upon questions of eminent domain in this District in a manner that has been denounced by the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Ohio in a manner that makes us all shudder and feel that we should be more careful than we have been in the past.

Mr. FINLEY. This is an old field, a piece of unimproved property, and this is for speculative purposes, I suppose, is it not?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do not know whether it is for a speculative purpose or not. That is what I am trying to find out, who wants this law. No abutting owner has asked for it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it does seem to me that the gentleman from Wisconsin ought to amend this bill and give the District of Columbia the right of appeal, giving the abutting owner the right to appeal, and say it literally, otherwise the court may rule that none is allowed. Let him go to the higher tribunals, where there are twelve jurors and where the court can look somewhat after the troubles which the gentlemen from Ohio and from Iowa alluded to this morning. But it does not do that.

Another thing. I asked the gentleman if he would not accept an amendment directing that the attorney for the District of Columbia be required to be present and represent the District and protect its rights in this matter.

When I asked my colleague [Mr. SIMS] if he knew of any district attorney or legal officer representing the Government of the United States or the District of Columbia who appeared in our condemnation proceedings he said he had not heard of any. I have not heard of any. Gentlemen, are we going on in this slipshod way, picking up seven men off the street, making them jurors and letting them collect the testimony? That is the provision of the law as I understand it, that these seven men are to gather up the testimony.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. The gentleman makes the statement that he does not know of anyone who appears to represent the District. I am reliably informed that in all these proceedings there is an attorney whose special duty it is to represent the District.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What makes me weary about the matter, and more or less distressed as a public official, is that the gentleman from Wisconsin refuses to allow his bill to be amended so as to compel that attorney to be there.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. It would seem to be a novel proceeding to write into the law a provision that this attorney should do his duty, when there is no reason to doubt that he does his duty.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Do you think it is a novel proceeding to compel an officer to do his duty?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Oh, no; but the gentleman assumes that he is not doing his duty without any evidence to support that assumption.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You say this whole thing is a reenactment of the law to a large extent. Why do you not reenact the part of the law compelling the legal adviser of the District to appear and represent the District?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. If we had any reason to suppose that he was not doing his duty there might be some reason for such an amendment, but there is no evidence of anything of that sort.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What harm can possibly be done by putting it right into the statutes? My dear sir, let us make the law plain. Let us not leave these statutes open to construction. Why, the Supreme Court reports show that on the antitrust act of 1890 and on the railroad cases the judges stood five to four each time, from the very first case down to the merger case. It was simply because that great statute is open to construction. Why not say literally what we mean?

Mr. PALMER. I suppose the reason why the committee do not favor any such amendment is because they presume that the District Commissioners and other officers representing the District have common sense.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That may be true, Mr. Chairman, and yet people of common sense sometimes do not know their duty, and if they know it they do not do it. I have been trying to find out whether the practice is for this legal adviser of the District of Columbia to be present. I have tried all the morning to find out, and there has been nobody who has opened his mouth and said either voluntarily or in reply to my inquiry that the district attorney has ever appeared in one of these cases.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill by sections for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That of the amount found to be due and awarded as damages for and in respect of the land condemned for extension of Kalorama road as herein provided such amount thereof shall be assessed by the jury hereinafter provided for as benefits, and to the extent of such benefits, against those pieces or parcels of land on each side of said road as extended, and also on any or all pieces or parcels of land which will be benefited by the opening of said road as said jury may find said pieces or parcels of land will be benefited; and in determining the amounts to be assessed against said pieces or parcels of land the jury shall take into consideration the respective situations of such pieces or parcels of land and the benefits they may severally receive from the extension of said street as aforesaid: Provided, That if the aggregate amount of the benefits to be assessed, as determined by said jury pursuant to the provisions hereof, is less than one-half of the amount of the damages awarded for and in respect of the land condemned, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may, in their discretion, reject the award and assessment of said jury, and all proceedings hereunder shall be null and void.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend line 14, on page 2, by striking out the word "one-half," and in line 16 by striking out the words "may, in their discretion," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "shall."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 14, strike out "one-half of;" in line 16 strike out "may, in their discretion," and insert in lieu thereof "shall."

Mr. HEPBURN. So that the section will read—I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That if the aggregate amount of the benefits to be assessed, as determined by said jury pursuant to the provisions hereof, is less than the amount of the damages awarded for and in respect of the land condemned, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall reject the award and assessment of said jury, and all proceedings hereunder shall be null and void.

Mr. HEPBURN. I want this in such shape that the gentlemen who want this road shall pay for it. That will effect it.

Mr. BABCOCK. This would defeat the very intention of this act—to strike out the word "one-half" in line 14. I ask that the question be divided. There is no great objection to striking out the words "may, in their discretion," and inserting the word "shall." That language is used to give the Commissioners a little latitude. Supposing the jury assessed benefits of 45 per cent or 48 per cent or 49 per cent, then they would have to reject it and go through with the whole proceeding again, under the amendment of the gentleman. That is the only objection I have to that. But if you strike out the word "one-half," you defeat the very object of the bill, which is to have the property benefited pay one-half and the District pay one-half of the amount found for damages.

Mr. HEPBURN. That is just what I want, to test the sense of this House with regard to this class of improvements. I am fully convinced that where improvements of this kind are to be made, those who are to be the beneficiaries should pay for the improvements. There is no reason why the Government should pay any portion of it. Everybody who has given any attention to this debate, or who is familiar with the topography and geography of the country out there, knows that this is a benefit to a very few people.

There is no general benefit that would result to the people of the District by the construction of this highway. It is to a few, largely those who are owners of this strip of territory, and in addition to them there are a few in the immediate vicinity that will have their property enhanced in value and convenience promoted. Now, these people I am perfectly willing should have this convenience and should have this addition to their value, but I want them to pay for it.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be divided, as suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin, and the Clerk will read the first portion of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 14, strike out the words "one-half of."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to this amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HEPBURN) there were—ayes 52, noes 43.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. BABCOCK and Mr. HEPBURN.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 69, noes 61.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the second section of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 16, on page 2, strike out the words "pay in their discretion" and insert in lieu thereof the word "shall."

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, there is no objection to that.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 4. That after the return of the marshal and the filing of proof of publication of the notice provided for in the preceding section, said court shall cause a jury of seven judicious, disinterested men, not related to any person interested in the proceedings, and not in the service or employment of the District of Columbia or of the United States, to be summoned by the marshal of the District of Columbia, to which jurors said court shall administer an oath or affirmation that they are not interested in any manner in the land to be condemned nor are in any way related to the parties interested therein, and that they will, without favor or partiality, to the best of their judgment, assess the damages each owner of land taken may sustain by reason of the extension of said road and the condemnation of lands for the purpose of such extension and assess the benefits resulting therefrom, as hereinbefore provided. The court before accepting the jury shall hear any objections that may be made to any member thereof, and shall have full power to decide upon all such objections and to excuse any juror or cause any vacancy in the jury when impaneled to be filled; and after said jury shall have been organized and shall have viewed the premises, said jury shall proceed, in the presence of the court, if the court shall so direct, or otherwise, as the court may direct, to hear and receive such evidence as may be offered or submitted on behalf of the District of Columbia, and by any person or persons having any interest in the proceedings for the extension of said avenue. When the hearing is concluded the jury, or a majority of them, shall return to said court, in writing, its verdict of the amount to be found due and payable as damages sustained by reason of the extension of said road under the provisions thereof and of the pieces or parcels of land benefited by such extension and the amount of the assessment for such benefits against the same.

Mr. WEBBER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the words, in lines 9 and 10, "or a majority of them" be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, in lines 9 and 10, strike out the words "or a majority of them;" so that it will read "when the hearing is concluded the jury shall return to said court," etc.

Mr. WEBBER. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that a foot of land should be taken from any person without first the intervention of the jury, and, secondly, not by a majority, but by the unanimous vote of the jury. That is in the spirit of all institutions. It is the law, I think, practically throughout the whole country, and it is right as a principle not to take one foot of land away from a freeholder in the District of Columbia without the verdict of every man impaneled upon the jury.

As a principle, I am against anything that will rob any citizen of this Republic of that constitutional right. It is a constitutional right, whether it is found in the letter of the Constitution of the United States or not. It is the unwritten law of our institutions from the formation of the Government.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio increase the jury from seven to twelve?

Mr. WEBBER. No; it leaves it at seven.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, some of the Members here will remember that in the codification of the Alaskan laws the committee reported a provision fixing their trial jury at six. Mr. Moody, now Attorney-General, and myself protested and secured an amendment fixing it at twelve. The Senate must have changed this back to six, and it was enacted, although I was informed the Senate made no "material" changes in the House bill. The next I heard of it the Supreme Court of the United States, last session in a criminal case, held this law was void, and that the defendant was entitled to be tried by twelve jurors, no more, no less.

Now, in this kind of a proceeding—eminent domain—we can provide for seven jurors. But, gentlemen, if you keep trenching on the old common law, abandoning the old-fashioned principles, as my friend from Ohio says, after a while we will be like the old darky was who had a very dissolute daughter. Every time the negroes had a religious meeting in the nighborhood she would "get religion," and in the course of a few weeks she would backslide. She became a chronic backslider. One day, in passing the negro chapel, I heard the "sisters" shout that "Mary Jane has got religion." I rode on home, pushed my sack of meal off my pony, and went to the bottom of the hill to water my horse, and there I saw "old Aunt Mary" washing clothes. I said: "I have some good news for you, Aunt Mary." She said, "What is it, my son; what is it? God knows I am always glad to hear something good." I said, "Mary Jane has got religion." She said, "Has she?" And I said "Yes." She said, "How do you know?" I said, "I heard them say so a while ago as I came along by the church." "Yes," she says, "she keeps gittin' religion and gittin' religion and blacksliding and er blacksliding, and after a while she will get right back in hell, whare she ought to be." [Laughter.]

Now, gentlemen, if we keep on evading the Constitution, discrediting its principles, crushing its spirit, after a while we will have no Constitution and we will be back exactly where we ought to be, and have to fight for its reestablishment. A jury at common law and as written in the Constitution "means twelve jurors, no more, no less," says the Supreme Court. I am unalterably opposed to seven jurors. After a while, only a while, we will be "taking" property and life everywhere without any jury. There is a mysterious strength and sacredness about a jury of twelve; "no more, no less." Do not trifle with this sacred byword of home and liberty. If you can do thus in a plain highway case you can have seven jurors in a plain little log-cabin case, or a mansard case, or any other civic case. Start the ball rolling from the top of the hill and it will go on to the bottom.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. What constitution does the gentleman refer to whereby the people of the District of Columbia are entitled to get a jury of twelve?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will not undertake to discuss the proposition at this late hour in the day. I will refer the gentleman to the Callan case and the Thompson case, from the District of Columbia, and to the recent Alaskan case, where he will find more law on the subject than I can tell him in the time I ought to take on this floor just now.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I believe if this amendment, offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WEBBER], is agreed to, and I think it ought to be, the bill will be perfect in that respect. I quite appreciate what the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] has said about the decision of the Supreme Court, but this is a special procedure, created by a special statute, and my object in having the entire verdict of the seven men grows out of the fact that here is a proceeding to take another man's property, and the marshal of the District may pick the jurymen without any limitation whatever. He can go out and pick up seven men anywhere, and I think we ought to have the verdict of the seven men—the entire jury. I do not think the objection made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] is applicable in a case of this character. It might be like an order in partition, which the court may send to three men. It might be like any order of appraisement in a dead man's estate, where the court can select any number that it sees fit, and in this case we provide for seven men. The only question is whether we will compel the verdict of the seven men or divide it up so that a majority of three and a half men or four men to three may render a verdict. I think if this amendment is agreed to the bill will be in that particular entirely satisfactory.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] misunderstood me. I did not say, and I do not contend, that we can not create a jury of seven in this special proceeding, and especially where we allow an appeal and trial by a jury of twelve.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Possibly I was not as clear on that point as I should have been, but I do say that we ought to stop having juries of less than twelve. Twelve is the common-law jury. It is the law of history and safety. It has protected us in our lives and liberties for more than a century and far beyond that. Yet you come in with this, your new-fangled way, your quick way, your short way, and abandon those old precious principles. To me this is distressing. If there is any virtue in twelve, there must be less virtue in seven, and if we have lived safely in these matters with juries of twelve men, why should we at this day abandon the common-law jury of twelve? Of course I know the courts hold we can do this, but I think it is reprehensible and dangerous, and especially so when Congress sanctions it.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] that in a city like this there is a great deal of this sort of proceeding going on from time to time, and it so happens often that rich men buy property and hold it for speculative purposes. If it is possible for a man to be corrupted, when you require a unanimous verdict of the jury, all the property owner has to do is to have one juror hold out for what the property owner thinks he ought to get, and then possibly by holding and preventing a verdict from time to time the property enhances in value and the necessities of the case are such that he will get two or three times what it is worth, whereas in a majority verdict you are more likely to bring in what is a more reasonable verdict.

Mr. SULZER. Is it not a fact that the Government can take condemnation proceedings to acquire title to this property?

Mr. SIMS. But it is not a Government proceeding.

Mr. SULZER. Is it not begun under that provision of the Constitution, the right of eminent domain?

Mr. SIMS. This is for the city and the District of Columbia.

Mr. SULZER. It can be done in the same way. If it is too much, the Government can resort to condemnation proceedings.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What I reprehend is cutting down the jury from twelve to seven.

Mr. SULZER. And the gentleman is right about that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And then going a step further and allowing four out of seven to pass judgment on the citizens' property. It is a bad precedent. Now, there you have four men instead of twelve to take my house from me, whereas if some one maliciously takes my life you try the man who assaults me with a jury of twelve.

There is not much difference when you take a man's home away from his wife and little children—there is not much difference between that and going along and taking his life. They are sacred; home, life, and liberty go along together.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Are we operating under the five-minute rule? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. We are working under the five-minute rule, and the five minutes of the gentleman from Tennessee expired as he closed his remarks.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word in reference to this jury. Time and experience in a great many cases have proven that this form of law—the one you are discussing now—has worked in all respects equitably and justly not only to the District but to property owners, and I desire to say that if you require the unanimous verdict of a jury you put the power in the hands of one man to hang the verdict. If, for instance, a verdict should be equitably $6,000, one man on that jury can say, "You must make this $10,000 or I will not sign;" and to my mind it will work out an injustice—an injustice to the District, an injustice to those who are paying for these street-opening cases, and I want to state further, gentlemen, that it will be a dangerous precedent to adopt this amendment. Now you are acting and you are abiding by a majority vote. This is not a case of a trial before a court at law for murder or for a crime, but it is a question as to the valuation of property to be taken for public uses, and I tell you, gentlemen, it is a dangerous amendment. I confidently believe, if you adopt the amendment, the result will be to stop all street-opening cases in the District of Columbia or the Commissioners will have to come back to Congress with the statement that it is not safe and it is impossible for them to go ahead with any further improvements of this character.

Mr. WEBBER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BABCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. WEBBER. Do you know of any State in the Union where a jury of less than twelve is authorized in condemning property?

Mr. GROSVENOR. And that by unanimous verdict. Every State in the Union.

Mr. WEBBER. And that by unanimous verdict.

Mr. BABCOCK. I will say that this action, as I understand it, is not a law proceeding under eminent domain to take property, but this is a special proceeding, the operation of which has been demonstrated by experience of many years in the District of Columbia to be the best and most equitable method in the condemnation of land in street-extension cases.

Mr. WEBBER. That does not answer the question. Do you know what State?

Mr. BABCOCK. I want to state further to the gentleman that in many cases the court appoints commissioners of three or five, as the case may be, to assess damages and report to the court.

Mr. WEBBER. I will ask the gentleman what State——

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Michigan is one.

Mr. BABCOCK. The court has to approve the verdict before it goes into effect, and I say to the gentleman from Ohio that in my judgment this would be a dangerous amendment, and would operate directly in opposition to what he intends it should.

Mr. WEBBER. If I understand, Mr. Chairman, the point the gentleman makes is this, that some of these jurors may be corrupted and therefore proceedings blocked. Am I right?

Mr. BABCOCK. I stated that one man could hang the other six.

Mr. WEBBER. You said, if I understood you corerctly, more than that.

Mr. BABCOCK. This provides for a jury of seven and a majority controls the verdict, and that verdict is rendered to the court and the court has to approve it before it goes into effect. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his amendment, because I consider it a very serious question.

Mr. WEBBER. Mr. Chairman, I can not see it that way. The chairman of the committee says it is a very serious question, and to that I accede. It is an exceedingly serious question, if things are in that condition in the District of Columbia where proceedings are liable to be blocked because of corruption.

Mr. BABCOCK. I never mentioned the word "corruption," Mr. Chairman.

Mr. WEBBER. Well, the record will show. I do not want to misquote the gentleman at all, but I know that throughout the States of the Union—there may be some exceptions, but practically all of them—it is understood by all present that a jury of twelve and all of the twelve are required to take one foot of land from anybody, and I think this is a very dangerous precedent. It may have been the practive heretofore to allow a proceeding of that character, but for one I protest and register my vote against this. I can not see it in any other way, and I still insist upon the amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I am very much surprised to hear the gentleman from Wisconsin express astonishment at an amendment of this character.

Why, this matter of requiring a unity of action on the part of jurors is as old as our civilization. It comes down from Magna Charta; it is a part of our judicial system that every man regards as the one particular jewel in the crown of our civilization. The requiring of this unanimity of action is not new, but the experience of centuries acquiesces in its wisdom and justice. Why should we make an exception here? This is not a trivial matter. Under this proceeding that is now contemplated there may be a sum of eight or nine thousand dollars involved, a sum that the people of this District may be contending for in order to secure their rights. Why should we not observe that procedure that all of these centuries have determined to be wise and just?

I want to make still another amendment to this section and to strike out the words, when the time comes, "if the court shall so direct, or otherwise as the court may direct," and compel this proceeding to be had in the presence of the court. I want to give all the dignity possible to the adjudication of this question, that involves eight or nine thousand dollars to the people of this District. It is an important suit. If you can not take from a man his property to the amount of $20 without giving him the benefit of a jury in the presence of a court, presided over by a court with all the power possible to give respect and dignity to that proceeding, ought we here, in the interest of the stockjobbers in real estate in this District, to waive all that and allow a man to be despoiled, as he may be, under this proceeding? I think it ought to have all of the dignity with which we can surround it. And, more than that, I want this section further amended so that all that testimony that may be offered may not necessarily be received. These gentlemen have so worded this section that whatever testimony is offered, without regard to any of the questions usually involved in the procurement of testimony, shall be received. Note what the language is:

Said jury shall proceed in the presence of the court if the court shall so direct, or otherwise as the court may direct, to hear and "receive" such evidence as may be offered or submitted.

That is what the testimony must be. Whether it is competent or incompetent, whether it is relevant or irrelevant, whether it clouds the issue or whether it makes it clearer, it has all got to be "received" under the peculiar wording of this bill. Why should that language be in there? If this is to be a fair proceeding, if it is to have some relation to the dignity of ordinary proceedings in court, why should the judge have the power to send the jury off into some dark room and then compel them there to receive any testimony that anyone, no matter what his cupidity may be, no matter what his interest may be, no matter how vile he may be, may wish to offer. I confess that in all the experience that I have had with statutes, with questions that have been submitted to Congress, I have never yet seen one that compelled the jury to "receive" that testimony which any interested or any person might see fit to force upon its attention.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Now, Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will be defeated. In the first place, this procedure seems to be entirely satisfactory to the people living in the District, where this practice has been followed for the last six or seven years. And I have yet to learn that any proceeding of this kind, either upon the part of any property owner or any attorney acting for a property owner, is not entirely satisfactory.

Now, as to the contention of the gentleman that it ought to be in the presence of the court, I will say that this proceeding is in the nature of a proceeding held before commissioners of estates. In that case the testimony is not taken before the court. Neither has the verdict to be unanimous. For instance, here is an estate in which a party has a claim, for example, $50,000 against the estate. In Michigan when there is no doubt as to what commissioners will do the attorneys, in selecting the number of commissioners, usually select two, simply for the purpose of saving expense, but where there is likely to be a contest they select three, and a majority of the three determine what the verdict shall be. That is precisely what is done in this case, and I earnestly hope that this amendment will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WEBBER].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HEPBURN. Division! Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 41; noes 43.

Mr. WEBBER. Tellers!

The question was taken on ordering tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused. The noes have it, and the amendment is rejected.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in lines 4 and 5 on page 4, the words "if the court shall so direct, or otherwise, as the court may direct."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, lines 4 and 5, strike out the words "if the court shall so direct, or otherwise, as the court may direct."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, just a word in reference to that. That is on old practice here of the court, and this is taking away one of the rights and privileges of the court, which, I think, it will hardly be good judgment to do. I hope that the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. HEPBURN. It is not a prerogative of the court. We can authorize a court, if we see fit, not to perform this duty; otherwise it will be the duty of the court to perform it. I think that there is no reason why a matter involving an amount of money that this case may involve should not receive the attention of a justice of the court. There is no hardship to anybody, and it certainly will have a good effect to have a judge there to determine interlocutory questions that may arise during the presentation of the proof. I think it is a wise thing to have this adjudication and that it shall be under the surveillance and in the presence of and with the aid of a competent judge.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will prevail. While, as I said a few moments ago, this is a small matter compared with many others, and while there is but five or six thousand dollars involved in the opening of this little street of 200 feet, yet within the memory of many Members of Congress bills of this kind have previously been before Congress where it extended a distance of a quarter or half a mile, where many thousands were involved. Therefore it seems to me that a court would not waste its time in sitting and hearing the matters in controversy, especially where the proposed law simply orders and directs that the evidence of every person shall be received without any judge or judicial officers sitting there to determine upon the competency of this evidence. It is more in the nature of a marshal's or commissioner's court, without any judge presiding, as to the rules of evidence. Evidence of an illegal character, contrary to law, may be admitted without the presence of a court, where hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of property are passed upon. The court should at least pass upon the competency of the evidence received and would then be in better position to determine the legal questions which might arise. I hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, the right of a jury in the appraisement of the value of property taken under the right of eminent domain, in the original proceeding, does not exist in any considerable number of States of the Union. Almost universally the practice is that commissioners or appraisers are appointed by the court, in some jurisdictions three, and some five, as the court may direct. In some States the number is provided by statute. The object is to have appraisers or commissioners in the first instance to appraise the property to be taken. In nearly all jurisdictions the right of appeal lies to a court, where the whole question may be gone over de nova, testimony offered upon the one side and upon the other, in the presence of a court, before twelve jurors, where the rights of the contending parties may be fully adjudicated under the direction of the court. So that, in this instance, it is unfortunate that this bill calls these appraisers or commissioners "jurors" instead of commissioners or appraisers, as is usual in many of the States of the Union.

The people whose property is condemned under the provisions of this bill are not deprived of the right of a trial by jury. Under section 11 of the bill an appeal by an interested party may be taken, and there lies the right of a trial by jury.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I beg the gentleman's pardon; that is exactly what it does do—to deny a trial by jury.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think that the right of a trial is given here. Under the common law there is a right to trial by jury. If there is not in the bill, there should be, and an amendment of that kind should be offered.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If you do that I will withdraw my objection to the bill.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. It is the practice now.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It can not be the practice under this bill. It is artfully drawn to prevent a trial or a possibility of a trial by jury.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am informed that that is the practice in the District.

Mr. GROSVENOR. There is no trial by jury to be had under this bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If it is not the practice in the District of Columbia now, in all cases of appeal from awards by appraisers, I say that it ought to be, and I understand that it is.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman will read the upper part of page 5, he will find what the procedure is in case the court sets aside the verdict. It will simply be a repetition of what has been had already—another jury.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But the question now before the committee is that of the right of a jury of twelve before a court in the original appraisement. I think there is no question that this amendment should be voted down and that the practice followed in other jurisdictions should be followed here. Then if this bill does not already permit an appeal, and if it is not the practice within this District to give that right, I favor giving it, so that the question shall be tried de novo on such appeal before a court and jury.

Mr. PALMER. That is expensive for the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, before that amendment is voted on I want to say just a word in reference to this. It seems that a wrong impression has been conveyed here. That is, that there is a denial of the right of appeal after this verdict has been rendered. There is nothing of the kind. Cases have been held over and over again, where parties dissatisfied with the amount of a verdict have gone into court and had a trial before a jury, the same as they would in a case of any other claim. Now, what does this do? This is enacted to provide that no appeal shall estop the opening of the street or prevent others from receiving their awards.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. You mean to cut the head off and give the remedy afterwards?

Mr. BABCOCK. It does not prevent anyone from going into court and establishng his rights.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman had read his own bill, I am inclined to think he would not have made the statement with which he last astonished the House.

Mr. BABCOCK. The gentleman has read the bill a great many times.

Mr. HEPBURN. Let me read section 6:

That the court shall have power to hear and determine any objections which may be filed to said verdict or award, and to set aside and vacate the same, in whole or in part, when satisfied that it is unjust or unreasonable, and in such event a new jury shall be summoned, who shall proceed to assess the damages or benefits, as the case may be, in respect of the land as to which the verdict may be vacated, as in the case of the first jury.

In other words, when the court wishes to set aside this proceeding, then it may enter such an order that there shall be a repetition of the same thing. That is the remedy; that is the appeal; that is the possibility of getting a common-law jury, and that is the only one.

Mr. BABCOCK. That is the remedy when the court sets aside the verdict of the jury——

Mr. GROSVENOR. It goes right back to another jury.

Mr. BABCOCK. The proceedings have to be gone over again.

Mr. HEPBURN. When a case is heard in court before a judge and jury it is tried according to the common law. There everything is open and aboveboard. There the witnesses who appear are subjected to cross-examination. Interlocutory questions are raised and decided by a competent court. There a man has some of the benefits of being heard and of having his day in court before he is deprived of constitutional rights. Here it is not so. This may be a matter of comparatively little importance in this case; but the gentleman from Wisconsin astounded us a little while ago by assuring us that this provision was a reprint of the general form that they use in all these matters of a similar character here in this District.

Mr. BABCOCK. It is a copy.

Mr. HEPBURN. Then if it is a copy it is time for the House of Representatives to set its seal of condemnation upon that class of procedure. It may be inconsequential here. It may be of vast importance in the next case, where gentlemen will reproduce the same procedure in the name of justice.

Mr. BABCOCK. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Iowa would read the first line of section 11 of the bill he would see what this is intended for.

That no appeal by any interested party—

Now, what does that do?

That no appeal by any interested party from the decision of the supreme court of the District of Columbia confirming the assessment or assessments of benefits or damages herein provided for nor any other proceeding at law or in equity by such party against the confirmation of such assessment or assessments shall delay or prevent the payment of award to others in respect to the property condemned nor delay or prevent the taking of any of said property sought to be condemned nor the extension of such road.

In other words, that no appeal by any interested party shall delay or prevent the payment of awards to others. That is all. The very language of the bill itself shows the right of appeal under the law, and not only that, but case after case has been conducted in the District of Columbia where appeals have been taken. This simply provides that where perhaps fifty persons are given awards that the appeal of one or two of them shall not estop the others from receiving their money. That is all it does.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia tell the House what the practice is on appeal from a decision of the court?

Mr. BABCOCK. I prefer not to get into a legal discussion, because while I know what the practice is I am not a lawyer and I do not want to attempt to describe in legal terms the details of the procedure to be taken.

Mr. SHERLEY. I want to know whether such a bill would raise questions of fact as well as law or whether it would simply review the law.

Mr. BABCOCK. I can not answer the gentleman.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, if the Members of the House will possess themselves of this bill and give to it a very brief attention they will discover by the argument of the gentleman himself, repeated over and over again, that there is no possible avenue by which the owner of real estate sought to be condemned in this way can ever have a trial by jury. The gentleman has repeatedly—although I do not think he quite understood the force and effect of what he was saying—said that this was a special proceeding, a term which lawyers pretty well understand the meaning of; that it was of its own character a proceeding to condemn land, and that it was not of a character that could command the authorization of a common-law jury, but was a commission; and finally our friends have planted themselves on that ground.

Mr. BABCOCK. That is in the condemnation proceedings.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman does not understand the question at all. Now, this bill—and I ask the attention of every intelligent man—contains all the law there is on the subject of condemnation of this particular kind of land.

Mr. STERLING. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio if there is an eminent domain law in the District of Columbia.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I presume so. If there is, they ought to proceed under it, and there would be no necessity for this. That is what I have been claiming all the time. But, assuming that there is or is not, I assert—and no lawyer will contradict me—that all the rights and all the remedies that the owner of real estate has is given to him by this bill that I hold in my hand if it should become a law.

Now, what is there of it? The gentleman says that because in section 11 the words used are, "No appeal by interested parties shall" do so and so, that that carries a provision for an appeal. Why, that is far from it. The appeal contemplated there is an appeal provided for in the form of exceptions to the ruling of the court in setting aside the finding of the commission.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not going to worry any further with this bill. It is ill formed and absolutely defective in every particular. If there is a necessity for this legislation, this committee ought to take this bill back and examine it, and then come here with a perfected bill, when we can readily pass it. But this bill is defectve and ought not to be passed, and the House will make a great mistake if it should permit this bill to become a law.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to hear the amendment read again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, line 4, after the word "court," strike out "if the court shall so direct, or otherwise as the court may direct."

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, there is no more reason why this procedure should be in the presence of the court than there is that the commissioners should sit in the presence of the probate judge. It is not the practice to do that, nor when a circuit judge sits as a probate judge. When you and I come to die and have an estate to settle, the commissioners who are appointed will not sit in the presence of the court unless there is some special reason for it, but they will sit by themselves, and it will be in the power and discretion of the probate judge to say whether or not it is necessary for him to be present when the jury or commission is proceeding with its work.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HEPBURN), there were—ayes 55, noes 39.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 6 on page 4, the words "and receive."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, line 6, strike out the words "and receive."

Mr. BABCOCK. There is no objection to that, Mr. Chairman.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, in line 9, page 4, by inserting, after the word "avenue," the words "the evidence so presented shall be preserved as a record of the court."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, after the word "avenue," in line 9, page 4, the words "the evidence so presented shall be preserved as a record of the court."

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, there is no objection to that amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That if the use of a part only of any piece or parcel of ground shall be condemned, the jury in determining its value shall not take into consideration any benefits that may accrue to the remainder thereof from the extension of said road or highway, but such benefits shall be considered in determining what assessment shall be made on or against such part of such piece or parcel of land as may not be taken as hereinbefore provided.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK], to kindly explain the necessity for this section. Why should not those parts that are immediately adjacent or abutting to these lands stand just as the others do? Why should there be this fifth section at all?

Mr. BABCOCK. Well, there have been numerous instances where parts of property have been taken that practically destroyed the value of the portion not taken, as compared with pieces that have not been touched at all, and this provision has been deemed necessary on the part of the Commissioners, who have recommended and approved of that section in these bills.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Is not that an innovation on the common-law practice?

Mr. BABCOCK. No, I do not think that it is. It reads "but such benefits shall be considered in determining what assessment shall be made on or against such part of such piece or parcel of land as may not be taken as hereinbefore provided."

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, why should not the advantages be set off against the disadvantages and the results certified? That is the usual course.

Mr. BABCOCK. I think the last three lines do that.

Mr. PALMER. No; I do not think the last three lines fix it at all. Now, the usual, ordinary legal method is to set off the advantages against the disadvantages, and if the advantages exceed the disadvantages the landowner is given a verdict in accordance therewith, and if the damages exceed the advantages he gets a verdict for that amount. I can see no reason why this peculiar method should be adopted. It practically comes to the same thing, but it only tends to confuse and make not clear that which ought to be clear.

Mr. Chairman, I move that this section be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section 5.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is any objection to that. I do not think the section is vitally important.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That no appeal by any interested party from the decision of the supreme court of the District of Columbia confirming the assessment or assessments of benefits or damages herein provided for nor any other proceeding at law or in equity by such party against the confirmation of such assessment or assessments shall delay or prevent the payment of award to others in respect to the property condemned, nor delay or prevent the taking of any of said property sought to be condemned nor the extension of such road: Provided, however, That upon the final determination of said appeal or other proceeding at law or in equity the amount found to be due and payable as damages sustained by reason of the extension of said road under the provisions hereof shall be paid as hereinbefore provided.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I move the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 8, after the word "condemned," strike out the words "nor delay or prevent the taking of any of said property sought to be condemned nor the extension of such roads;" and at the end of line 14 add the following: "Provided further, That in all cases of appeal the same shall not operate to suspend the proceedings in said case as to the property covered unless a sufficient bond shall be given by said appellant in form and for the sum and upon such conditions as may be ordered by the court from which said appeal is taken."

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Very well.

Mr. BABCOCK. As to whether this amendment would, in effect, delay the opening of a street in case one party should appeal from a decision and commence suit to have it set aside?

Mr. GROSVENOR. If his property was necessary to the opening of the street it certainly would.

Mr. Chairman, this proposition looks to conform to the law of the United States, the constitutional provision that private property shall not be taken for public use except by due process of law. As long as a man has a right to insist that his property has not been taken by due process of law he ought to have the right to hold on to his property. This provision is that if he wants to appeal, if he is given the right of appeal—and the gentleman says he is, though I do not know where it is myself—if he will give a bond to indemnify the public for any damages they may sustain by reason of his appeal in ascertaining his rights he may hold on to his property until his rights are adjudicated. That, I think, is a fair provision and I have offered it in perfect good faith.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I think that amendment is all right, so far as this bill is concerned; but this provision in the bill was intended to operate in such cases as Sixteenth street and Fourteenth street, where there were a great many parties in interest and where one party has been the cause of holding the matter for a period of at least two years in a case where forty or fifty other interests were involved, where they could not mortgage or sell or dispose of their property nor borrow money on it nor have a loan renewed, and which has worked a great hardship to those in interest. That was the intention of this provision. However, it will not affect the purpose of this bill, and I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I think it had better go in. It certainly recognizes a fundamental principle of our holding of property in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise, with a favorable report to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DENBY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 130) authorizing an extension of Kalorama road NW., and had directed him to report said bill, with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith, as a case not acted upon by the Fifty-eighth Congress, a report from the Secretary of State and accompanying papers relating to the appeal for indemnity addressed to the equitable consideration of the Government of the United States by the owners of the Norwegian steamer Nicaragua.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, January 8, 1906.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President; which was read, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State resubmitting the claim, which was not acted upon by the Fifty-eighth Congress, of Messrs. Sivewright, Bacon & Co. for damages sustained by their vessel, the British steamship Eastry, in consequence of collisions at Manila in June, 1901, with certain coal hulks belonging to this Government.

I renew the recommendation which I made to the Congress on January 19, 1903, that, as an act of equity and comity, provision be made for reimbursement to the firm of the money expended by it in making the repairs to the ship which the collisions rendered necessary.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 8, 1906.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President; which was read, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of December 16, 1905, requesting the President "to cause to be prepared as soon as may be practicable and to communicate to the House information as to the number of clerks and other civil employees in the classified service, male or female, in each of the Executive Departments of the Government and in the Government Printing Office and under the Smithsonian Institution, and in the aggregate, in the city of Washington who have reached the age of 70 years or more," I transmit herewith reports from the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Attorney-General, the Postmaster-General, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, the Public Printer, the Acting Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Civil Service Commission, giving the information requested in said resolution.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 8, 1906.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I inclose herewith the annual report of the Isthmian Canal Commission, the annual report of the Panama Railroad Company, and the Secretary of War's letter transmitting the same, together with certain papers.

The work on the Isthmus is being admirably done, and great progress has been made, especially during the last nine months. The plant is being made ready and the organization perfected. The first work to be done was the work of sanitation, the necessary preliminary to the work of actual construction; and this has been pushed forward with the utmost energy and means. In a short while I shall lay before you the recommendations of the Commission and of the board of consulting engineers as to the proper plan to be adopted for the canal itself, together with my own recommendations thereon. All the work so far has been done not only with the utmost expedition, but in the most careful and thorough manner; and what has been accomplished gives us good reason to believe that the canal will be dug in a shorter time than had been anticipated and at an expenditure within the estimated amount. All our citizens have a right to congratulate themselves upon the high standard of efficiency and integrity which has been hitherto maintained by the representatives of the Government in doing this great work. If this high standard of efficiency and integrity can be maintained in the future at the same level which it has now reached, the construction of the Panama Canal will be one of the feats to which the people of this Republic will look back with the highest pride.

From time to time various publications have been made, and from time to time in the future various similar publications doubtless will be made, purporting to give an account of jobbery, or immorality, or inefficiency, or misery, as obtaining on the Isthmus. I have carefully examined into each of these accusations which seemed worthy of attention. In every instance the accusations have proved to be without foundation in any shape or form. They spring from several sources. Sometimes they take the shape of statements by irresponsible investigators of a sensational habit of mind, incapable of observing or repeating with accuracy what they see, and desirous of obtaining notoriety by widespread slander. More often they originate with, or are given currency by, individuals with a personal grievance. The sensation mongers, both those who stay at home and those who visit the Isthmus, may ground their accusations on false statements by some engineer, who, having applied for service on the Commission and been refused such service, now endeavors to discredit his successful competitors, or by some lessee or owner of real estate who has sought action or inaction by the Commission to increase the value of his lots, and is bitter because the Commission can not be used for such purposes; or on the tales of disappointed bidders for contracts; or of office holders who have proved incompetent or who have been suspected of corruption and dismissed, or who have been overcome by panic and have fled from the Isthmus. Every specific charge relating to jobbery, to immorality, or to inefficiency, from whatever source it has come, has been immediately investigated, and in no single instance have the statements of these sensation mongers and the interested complainants behind them proved true. The only discredit inhering in these false accusations is to those who originate and give them currency, and who, to the extent of their abilities, thereby hamper and obstruct the completion of the great work in which both the honor and the interest of America are so deeply involved. It matters not whether those guilty of these false accusations utter them in mere wanton recklessness and folly, or in a spirit of sinister malice to gratify some personal or political grudge.

Any attempt to cut down the salaries of the officials of the Isthmian Commission, or of their subordinates who are doing important work, would be ruinous from the standpoint of accomplishing the work effectively. To quote the words of one of the best observers on the Isthmus, "Demoralization of the service is certain if the reward for successful endeavor is a reduction of pay." We are undertaking in Panama a gigantic task—the largest piece of engineering ever done. The employment of the men engaged thereon is only temporary, and yet it will require the highest order of ability if it is to be done economically, honestly, and efficiently. To attempt to secure men to do this work on insufficient salaries would amount to putting a premium upon inefficiency and corruption. Men fit for the work will not undertake it unless they are well paid. In the end the men who do undertake it will be left to seek other employment with as their chief reward the reputations they achieve. Their work is infinitely more difficult than any private work, both because of the peculiar conditions of the tropical land in which it is laid, and because it is impossible to free them from the peculiar limitations inseparably connected with Government employment; while it is unfortunately true that men engaged on public work, no matter how devoted and disinterested their services, must expect to be made the objects of misrepresentation and attack. At best, therefore, the positions are not attractive in proportion to their importance; and among the men fit to do the task, only those with a genuine sense of public spirit to do the great work for the work's sake can be obtained; and such men can not be kept if they are to be treated with niggardliness and parsimony, in addition to the certainty that false accusations will continually be brought against them.

I repeat that the work on the Isthmus has been done and is being done admirably. The organization is good. The mistakes are extraordinarily few, and these few have been of practically no consequence. The zeal, intelligence, and efficient public service of the Isthmian Commission and its subordinates have been noteworthy. I court the fullest, most exhaustive, and most searching investigation of any act of theirs, and if any of them is ever shown to have done wrong his punishment shall be exemplary. But I ask that they be decently paid, and that their hands be upheld as long as they act decently. On any other conditions we shall not be able to get men of the right type to do the work; and this means that on any other condition we shall insure, if not failure, at least delay, scandal, and inefficiency in the task of digging the giant canal.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 8, 1906.

BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill:

H. R. 99. An act to aid the Council City and Solomon River Railroad Company.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. GRAHAM, for four days, on account of sickness.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. JONES of Washington was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of German M. Rouse, Fifty-eighth Congress, first session, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Does not the report of the Committee of the Whole House recently made have precedence that would enable us to conclude that business now, if it is practicable? There are many gentlemen who would like to dispose of that at this time.

The SPEAKER. In answer to the parliamentary inquiry, the Chair will state to the gentleman from Iowa that this is District day, and there is unfinished business before the House. If the House does not conclude consideration of it to-day, it will go over until the next District day.

Mr. HEPBURN. I am assuming that my friend from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is about to move to adjourn. I hope he will withhold the motion.

Mr. PAYNE. I was about to move to go into Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. HEPBURN. Let us conclude this matter now.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman call for the regular order.

Mr. HEPBURN. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the first amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH] desires a vote for each amendment separately, does he not?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I was about to say to the House I had stepped out of the Chamber, and just before I did so I was informed by the chairman of the committee [Mr. BABCOCK] that this was on the Calendar as unfinished business, and he did not desire to take it up to-day.

Mr. HEPBURN. If there is any expressed wish about the matter I do not desire to interfere with it.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. In the absence of the chairman and under those circumstances I would not like to take it up.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. OLMSTED in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3—the Philippine tariff bill.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, no doubt the Members of the House were astonished last Saturday at the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LAWRENCE] in favor of tariff revision. I believe that they will recover from their astonishment somewhat when they learn the respective positions upon this question of the Republican voters of Massachusetts and the Republican leaders. The former are tired of paying tribute to the trusts and are clamoring loudly for relief for their industries. The Republican leaders are reducing the pressure upon themselves by making only such concessions as they are forced to while standing pat as much as they dare to. They did make a declaration in their platform last year, with the usual qualifications, that seemed something like a statement in favor of tariff revision at some future time not yet definitely ascertained. That declaration was appropriately characterized by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] as "a straddle and a bluff." They made that statement after the Democrats had elected a governor by a plurality of 35,000 votes in a State that is normally Republican by 60,000 votes.

This year they elected their candidate for governor by nominating an exceptionally popular man, who believes in low tariffs, by the small majority of 22,000, while the Republican candidate for lieutenant-governor, who was a high protectionist, was able, by means of stooping considerably and opportunely, to barely escape defeat by the small plurality of less than 2,000 votes.

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield for a question, I will ask him if he will state to this House what the Republican majority is in the house of representatives in Massachusetts and the Republican majority in the senate of Massachusetts and the gains in Republican senators made in the city of Boston alone?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I am ready to answer any question that will contribute even a little to the elucidation of the subject that we are considering, but I can not discover a connection between the increase in the number of senators from the city of Boston and the tariff question. I will say for the information of the gentleman, concerning his question of the increase of Republican senators and representatives throughout the State, that the Republican party has so gerrymandered the State of Massachusetts that they have an overwhelming majority in the legislature that does not at all represent the proportions of the two political parties. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts when that gerrymander occurred, and if the same division of districts has not been in force in Massachusetts for the last ten years and a new reapportionment is to be made this year on that account?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Now, Mr. Chairman, I must decline to answer that question, not out of any discourtesy to the gentleman, but because I am unable to see that it has the slightest relation to the subject in hand, and as I believe this House would like to rise at 5 o'clock and my speech will take until that time, I must decline to yield to any question that does not throw some light, at least a small ray, upon the subject which we are considering.

So you see, Mr. Chairman, that the people of Massachusetts, regardless of party, are practically united in favor of tariff revision. The intensity of that feeling is not adequately expressed in Republican platforms or Republican speeches. The tariff-revision sentiment has gone beyond the control of the Republican leaders of Massachusetts; and it is certain that the crow which the Republican party ate in their last convention is not their final experience with that unsavory dish. They will be compelled to eat more and more of it each year until they go the full length of the Democratic demand for honest tariff revision, not in the interest of its friends, the swollen trusts, but in the interest of the millions of consumers in this land. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

And as it is often argued by the Republicans of Massachusetts that we can not have free raw materials because of the alleged position of some members of my party in the Southern States, I am glad to be able to state, after consultation with many of them, that they are ready to vote for a bill for free hides if we will also support a bill that will give them free boots and shoes and a substantial reduction of the tariff upon products of leather. So, now, Mr. Speaker, that you have a better understanding of the tariff sentiment in Massachusetts, I trust that you will not be too severe upon my colleagues during their transition from the high-protection caterpillar state of political development to the low-tariff butterfly condition. [Laughter.] They are in an awkward dilemma, for upon one hand the people of Massachusetts are goading them to insurrection, while upon the other hand the Speaker of the House frowns sternly upon such unruly conduct. As political navigators they are doing their level best to steer the party boat clear of the Scylla of the Speaker's censure and the Charybdis of an indignant constituency. [Applause and laughter an the Democratic side.] Theirs is truly an embarrassing position, and you should commiserate rather than condemn them. They are really victims of circumstances over which they have no control. If, Mr. Speaker, you are moved toward harsh measures for these recalcitrants, I trust you will remember that "the quality of mercy is not strained; it droppeth as the gentle dew from heaven." And when you remember that, I know that you will forgive them. If you do not, Mr. Speaker, then, as an upright judge, you are bound to take into consideration their previous good conduct, for, you know, they have been good on the whole since the Dingley bill passed.

Beyond the silent introduction of a few free-hide bills by Members from shoemaking districts and a few free-coal bills during the excitement of the coal srike, which conduct may reasonably be excused upon the ground of pardonable local interest, they have been truly loyal to those great pillars of the Republican party, the beef trust, the steel trust, the coal trust, the lumber trust, and all the other trusts. [Applause and laughter.] And do not forget, Mr. Speaker, that they will come around all right again, provided the Republican party carries the next election by a substantial majority. So do not cut them off their committees, do not cut down their appropriaions for rivers and harbors and public buildings. Deal with them kindly. Treat them as lost sheep.

Just let them alone and they'll come home,
Wagging their tails behind them.

[Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, with your indulgence, I will discuss briefly the pending bill. Democrats should welcome the opportunity of discussing this measure, for it affords them a chance to declare their positions upon two important questions—our governmental relations to the Philippine Islands and the question of tariff reform. The minority report states clearly the Democratic position upon both of these questions. We believe that our governmental relations to the Philippine Islands violate both the Constitution of the United States and the genius of American institutions. Therefore, we favor a severance of those relations at the earliest possible moment, because we are convinced that while we retain the islands they will afford a standing argument for a larger Navy and for increased expenditures generally. Furthermore, it will leave upon us the stain of the sin of maintaining control of a people who aspire to be free men. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Democratic position in favor of free trade with the Philippine Islands is also in harmony with the Federal Constitution, which declares that all imposts, excises, and duties shall be uniform throughout the United States. If, however, the substitute bill offered by the minority fails to pass, then I will gladly vote for the pending bill, believing that the Democratic party ought to embrace every opportunity for tariff reform that is presented.

Now, I admit that a system is not a wise one which would include all the men of a country in a single enterprise. If instead of depending largely upon agriculture as we do we depended solely upon it, some great blight of nature might bring calamity to us, even as the failure of the potato crop brought famine upon Ireland. Therefore it is well that our industries are diversified and that our manufactures have grown to their present great dimensions. Although our abundant supplies of coal, iron, lumber, copper, silver, and gold would have made us successful in manufacturing without the aid of a tariff at all, still no one will quarrel now with the policy of those statesmen who in the early days laid small taxes for the encouragement of American manufactures. Yet the singular result of that small beginning is that while the manufacturers of this country have grown immensely wealthy, the taxes upon competing products have constantly increased. Still stranger is the fact that although these taxes had their origin in the patriotic desire to possess those articles in time of war which were needed for its prosecution, they have operated to enable American manufacturers to sell their products more cheaply to foreigners than to American citizens. Now, we have a country that is marvelously wealthy, wonderfully developed, and filled with a people of high intelligence.

There is no longer any need for the maintenance of a system of high protection. Its friends admit that many duties are too high that ought in justice to be lowered, but the reason they advance for noninterference with the existing schedules is that if one item is discussed then the entire schedules must be considered, and that it is better, therefore, to forego a consideration of any schedule rather than endanger the whole system.

Now, while this may furnish a sufficient motive for selfishly interested manufacturers, and those who represent them in Congress, it is not a good reason to give for nonaction to the American public. So other plausible pretexts had to be urged. A familiar one is that the Government should encourage diversity of occupations. A sufficient answer is that the Almighty provided for that when He gave us our broad acres of fertile lands, our vast stores of mineral wealth, our great forests, our mighty rivers and lakes, placed us between two great oceans, gave us our position in the temperate zone, and peopled our land with ambitious, intelligent, and industrious men. I am aware that credit to the Almighty for this beneficence is denied by the Republican party [laughter], and that they assert all our prosperity is due to the tariff, but I will not, at this late hour, go into a profitless discussion of the relative merits of these two sources of prosperity, for I believe that political necessities have made at least a portion of my audience somewhat biased. [Laughter.]

Another familiar argument is that the tariff is necessary in order to protect labor. Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe that American labor is sufficiently progressive to prosper without Government aid, but there is no need of debating that proposition now. If we accept the Republican ground for the continuance of the tariff schedules—namely, their desire to protect labor—an examination of the law will fail to disclose any justification for it. If they sought the protection of labor alone, then the rates would be only high enough to equalize the labor cost of articles produced in the United States and competing articles produced abroad. But an examination of the schedules will disclose that many articles are protected by tariff rates which exceed the entire labor cost of production. There is a bill pending in this Congress, introduced by the minority leader, which provides that no rate of duty shall exceed by 100 per cent the price of the foreign competing article. And yet I venture to predict that the Republican party, which bases its noninterference with the schedules upon its alleged desire to "protect" American labor, will not pay the slightest attention to this bill. But, Mr. Chairman, we have seen this "protection to labor" theory dealt a severe if not a mortal blow by one of its own friends. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, discussed the Philippine tariff bill for nearly four hours last Thursday, and I state confidently that he proved that American labor needs no protection. He anticipated the arguments of his Republican friends, who represent the sugar and tobacco interests affected by this bill, by declaring that the Filipino could not compete successfully with the American farmer. I cheerfully pay him the compliment of stating that he proved his case abundantly. He showed to us that the Filipino who is paid only a few cents a day, who frequently goes without shoes, without a hat, and without a coat, and sometimes without other unmentionable articles of his dress, is no match whatever in competition with the highly paid American farm laborer.

Now, here we have a demonstration by one of the gentlemen who has steadily opposed tariff reduction; by the gentleman who, in point of fact, as the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, sits effectively upon the lid of tariff discussion, that American labor need fear nothing in competition with Filipino labor.

Now, those who adopt his reasoning will see that it follows from this demonstration that we need not fear competition from the labor of Canada, Mexico, South America, or Europe, because the scale of wages is much higher in each of these countries than it is in the Philippine Islands. Therefore, we must conclude that the Republican cry of "pauper labor," which has become so familiar to us in political campaigns, has been raised for the sole purpose of frightening the American workman into supporting the policy of high protection and voting the Republican ticket.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. WEEKS. As to whether the gentleman himself thinks that American labor needs no protection.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I think that American labor needs no protection from such labor as has been mentioned in the case of the Philippine Islands, or from a great deal of the labor of the world. I think that the American farm laborers and mechanics are abundantly able to take care of themselves. I know we must have a tariff, because we must have revenues, and in imposing duties upon articles to raise a revenue we must afford incidental protection. I say that any tariff which will raise sufficient revenue under our existing system to run this Government will yield sufficient protection to American labor. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Then, as I understand it, in levying this tariff the gentleman would levy it with reference to revenue, regardless absolutely of protection?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, if it were the beginning of this country I would so levy the taxes. If we had an opportunity of providing another system, I would answer "Yes," but there is no need of making an affirmative answer at this late day. I believe it would be entirely proper for any party in power in levying tariffs to take into consideration American labor if it could be shown, and clearly shown, that there was any necessity for the protection of American labor.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. But the gentleman contends that there is no such evidence at this time.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will follow my speech he will find out exactly how far I go in this particular, and as we are near adjournment I will thank him if he will not interrupt at this stage. Later on I will be glad to answer any questions.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I understood the gentleman to invite interruptions if they were pertinent to his remarks.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I stand on that ground now. Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe no more significant admission has been made on the floor of this House in the last twenty years than that of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, the great tariff-making committee of the United States, for just as soon as it is discovered that there is either no need for protecting American labor by tariff schedules or need only of levying slight duties for its protection and that the tariff duties are levied for the purpose of enriching the manufacturers of this country then the people of this land will rise up and drive from power the party that perpetuates such a system.

We always contended as Democrats that the labor which was paid $1 per day was not necessarily cheaper than that which was paid $2 a day, for we argued that if the $2 a day labor actually produced four times as much as the $1 per day labor, then the $1 a day labor was actually twice as dear to its employer as the $2 a day labor. So I do not criticise the statements of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, for I find they are based upon sound economic principles, which have long been recognized and acted upon by the Democratic party. Now that tariff reduction has begun for the benefit of the Filipinos, however, why should not we continue the benefits of tariff reduction in order to help American citizens. Surely, if there is no fear of the cheaply paid labor of the Philippine Islands, there is no fear of the competition of the labor of the Canadian wheat raiser, the coal and iron miner, and the lumberman? Why not, therefore, give us a 75 per cent reduction of the rates upon coal, iron ore, lumber, wood pulp, fish, wheat, and other farm products that we get from Canada? You can confer no greater boon upon the people of the United States than to give them cheap food and clothing. Instead of depending for increases of wages upon the fear or whim of individual manufacturers, which increases would inevitably be unequal, the very moment you reduce the cost of food and clothing, that moment you increase the prosperity of labor by increasing the purchasing power of the wages of labor. On the other hand, the very moment that by tariff enactment you increase the cost of food and clothing, that moment you decrease the prosperity of labor by curtailing the purchasing power of the wages of labor. Now, why should we not put the Canadians, who are our brothers in blood, in speech, in customs, and institutions, upon terms of equality with the Filipinos, who are unlike us in all these respects, who are thousands of miles distant from us and who came to us solely as the accidental result of war? Why not go further and adopt reciprocal relations with France. The senior Senator from Massachusetts based his objection to the French reciprocal treaty, as I remember it, upon the ground that French jewelry might compete injuriously with the cheap jewelry manufactured at Attleboro, Mass. Now, in order to protect that interest of comparatively slight importance we sacrificed a market which, according to Hon. W. A. Harris, of the National Live Stock Association of the United States, would be worth $40,000,000 annually to the farmers of this country.

Why not go further and adopt reciprocal tariff relations with Germany and with South America? The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] asked the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] the other day what would a great food-consuming nation like Germany do without the food stuffs of the United States, and he indicated by his manner that he was confident that the retaliatory tariff which will be adopted by Germany in March will speedily be abandoned in order to admit at lower rates of duty American farm products. But I tell the gentleman that he would not be so serene in his conclusions if he had examined the history of recent meat exportations from the United States to Germany. If he did, that examination would disclose to him that since these discriminatory meat-inspection laws have been in force the prices of hogs, oxen, calves, and lambs have increased marvelously, and that as a consequence the importation of them from the United States has fallen off tremendously. He would find that hogs which sold at wholesale in 1900 for 9 cents a pound sold in 1904 for 14 cents a pound; that fat oxen which sold for 11 cents sold in 1904 for 15 cents; that calves which sold for 14 cents sold in 1904 for 18 cents, and that lambs which sold for 11 cents sold in 1904 for 14 cents; and he will find that in 1898 we sold to the Germans twenty times more pork, fifty times more hams and shoulders, and fourteen times more bacon than we did in 1904. Now, then, Mr. Chairman, this does not indicate that the Germans had to buy our beef and pork and lambs from us, and I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio, in the light of that experience, why will they be compelled to buy their breadstuffs from us when the retaliatory tariff goes into operation?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I presume the gentleman does not want me to reply at this particular time, but with his leave I will answer that question at a later date.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I will be very glad to give the gentleman the unlimited time he will require to answer that question. Now, Mr. Chairman, the United States is not the sole producer of cattle, corn, and wheat. There are other sources of supply that are available to the Germans. The Argentine Republic is raising a choice quality of cattle. They have built packing houses, and they are shipping dressed meat to the markets of Europe in competition with us to-day. The Argentine Republic has a great field for the raising of wheat, and they have begun to raise sheep also upon an extensive scale. When the people in the Argentine Republic learn that they are to be permitted to trade upon preferential terms under the favored-nation clause of the German tariff, their raising of those articles will be stimulated by the prospect of a larger and a more stable market, and they will compete with us more injuriously than they are doing now. Furthermore, Canada is prepared to become the great wheat field of the world. She will raise an immense quantity of wheat in the next few years, and she will undertake to compete with us for the markets of Europe. Russia, Austria-Hungary, and Roumania raise wheat upon a large scale, and the farm products of these countries will come into competition with ours. There are other sources of supply available to the Germans, and I believe that these people will loyally support the policy of their Government, which is to compel the favorable introduction into the United States of German articles of export. The Germans, I believe, will be willing to curtail their supply, both of bread and meat, when they find the increased prices of the American products compel them to economize. That reduced consumption follows increased prices is the history of the whole world. Now, I trust that the Members of this House will not rush the country heedlessly into a tariff war with Germany or any other country, for if they consult the pages of history they will learn that tariff wars are always unprofitable. That idea can be best illustrated, perhaps, by the story of the two dogs that were contending so furiously for a bone that they did not observe a third dog who came along and seized the bone and made off with it. France enjoyed friendly commercial relations with Italy, but the protectionists of both countries forced the governments to abandon friendly relations and enter upon a tariff war.

A short experience convinced them that it was unprofitable for both countries, for while they were contending neutral nations came in and took possession of their markets. Therefore, as sensible people, they adopted reciprocal relations as speedily as possible. The same is true of the tariff wars between France and Switzerland and France and Russia. In the event of a tariff war between Germany and the United States undoubtedly both countries would suffer tremendously, and no interest would suffer so much as the agricultural interests of the United States. They would find a very profitable source for their exports cut off, and it would be extremely difficult to dispose of this new surplus upon terms favorable to themselves. Now, perhaps, some good may result from this scheme of things, for the American farmer may awaken to a sense of the inequalities of the Dingley tariff, and drive out the party that perpetuates that system.

What do the farmers receive from the tariff? They get no more for their cattle now than they got in 1897, when the duty of 15 per cent was placed upon hides, yet that duty has increased the cost to them of the shoes they wear and the harness they place upon their horses. The tariff has not increased the price of the wheat and the corn which they export, for the prices are fixed in the great free-trade market of Liverpool and are based upon the visible supply of these commodities and the probable demand for them. Yet that tariff has increased to them the cost of farming machinery, of agricultural implements, of supplies, of materials that enter into their farm buildings and their dwellings, while the excessive cost of steel rails has imposed an additional handicap upon them by increasing the cost of the transportation of their products to the markets. Surely there is no one in the United States who ought to complain more loudly of the abuses of the present tariff than the long-suffering American farmer.

Now, I will conclude this discussion, Mr. Chairman, in a few moments. I have noticed in this debate a tendency to regard the excess of exports over imports as the best evidence of our national prosperity, and, of course, that excess is attributed to the operation of the Dingley tariff. The Republican party is resourceful in expedients. It is ingenious in framing plausible excuses. In the years when the Republican tariff failed to cause an excess of exports over imports—when, in fact, our imports, year after year, exceeded our exports—we never heard this present-day theory that the prosperity of the nation was based upon the excess of the exports over imports. It was not until the last few years, when our exports exceeded our imports, that this new theory was devised as a pretext for continuing the existing schedules.

Now, that theory can be sound only upon the assumption that every time we sell we make gains, while every time we buy we suffer loss. That theory disregards the fundamental principle that all commerce is barter, and that money balances are merely the instrumentalities which close the aggregate of commercial transactions.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] pointed with pride to the fact that our exports this year were $1,491,744,000, while our imports were $1,117,512,000. He triumphantly referred to this excess of $374,232,000 as a vindication of the policy of protection and as the sole criterion of our national prosperity. Now, suppose, Mr. Chairman, that we sold $187,000,000 less and bought $187,000,000 more, so that our exports and imports would exactly balance, would the gentleman from Iowa state then that our national prosperity had departed? Why, if the people of the United States instead of having in their pockets, or in the pockets of a few of them, rather, the three hundred and seventy-four millions represented by the excess of exports, had in their possession $374,000,000 worth of foreign articles which they needed and which promoted their comfort and happiness, would they not be quite as well off as they are now?

Why, the excess of exports over imports is only a drop in the bucket compared with the total of our commercial transactions. This year the value of the products of the farms of the United States was $6,415,000, of our manufactories $16,000,000,000, of our minerals $1,289,000,000. The excess of exports was only 6 per cent of the total value of the agricultural products, only 2½ per cent of the total value of manufactures, and only 1½ per cent of the total value of our factories, farms, and mines, leaving out of the calculation entirely the value of the products of our fisheries and our forests.

No, it is not the excess of our exports that gauges our national prosperity, but the great volume of commercial transactions that are absolutely unrestricted by tariffs in the forty-five States and four Territories of this Union. [Loud applause.]

Some idea of the immensity of these internal transactions may be gained from the statements that we have now 211,000 miles of railroad, and that the net earnings of the railroads of the United States were $639,000,000 last year. Out of the total value of our farm products we exported only 12 per cent last year and had 88 per cent left for domestic uses. Out of the total value of our manufactures and our mines only 4 per cent were exported and 96 per cent were left at home for domestic consumption.

No, Mr. Chairman, it is the great system of free trade throughout the whole domain of the United States which has built up the prosperity of this nation. I trust that that system will be extended so that it will include Canada on the north of us and Mexico upon the south. I trust that it will be extended still further to embrace the whole American continent, so that standing together, with the cry of "America for the Americans," we will confidently face the outside world. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLMSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 3 and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. MORGAN. If I am in order at present, I call for the second reading of Senate bill 2828.

The bill (S. 2828) to provide for the regulation, by judicial authority, of the freight rates of railroad companies and other common carriers and the preferential advantages granted by such common carriers to certain persons and places, to the wrong and injury of others was read the second time by its title.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to submit some remarks upon the bill and will proceed now unless the Senate otherwise orders. I ask leave, without reading it, to introduce a copy of the bill as a part of my remarks.

The bill introduced by Mr. MORGAN January 8, 1906, is as follows:

A bill to provide for the regulation, by judicial authority, of the freight rates of railroad companies and other common carriers, and the preferential advantages granted by such common carriers to certain persons and places, to the wrong and injury of others.

Be it enacted, etc., That all railroad corporations or companies and all other corporations, companies, and persons engaged as common carriers in transporting, by land or water, freight or passengers among or between the States, or in or through the District of Columbia, are prohibited from demanding or receiving more than a reasonable compensation for such service on their respective lines of transportation, or any part thereof on which they are so engaged, directly or by agreement with any other corporation, company, or person; and they are likewise prohibited from giving unreasonable preferences in rates or charges for transportation services, or in the facilities of transportation, to any shipper or passenger to or between any place or places on such routes or lines of transportation to other shippers or passengers.

SEC. 2. That the shipper or owner of any property, or any passenger on lines or routes of transportation, such as are mentioned or described in section 1 of this act, may sue such common carrier in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the parties to the suit for the recovery of such unreasonable charges for transportation or for any damages sustained by the plaintiff in the suit by reason of the giving unreasonable preferences in rates or facilities of transportation that are prohibited in the first section of this act; and in any suit brought under or in accordance with the provisions of said section the court shall entertain jurisdiction without respect to the sum sought to be recovered therein: Provided, That the sum claimed by the plaintiff in the action shall be $50 or more.

SEC. 3. That appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States may be granted or writs of error may issue from the Supreme Court of the United States for the review of a final judgment in any suit authorized in sections 1 and 2 of this act on the application of any of the parties litigant without reference to the amount of the judgment therein, rendered in a district court of the United States, and in such cases the district courts and the Supreme Court of the United States shall advance the same for trial or hearing over other civil causes on their dockets if, in the opinion of the court, the public interests are not injuriously affected by such order.

SEC. 4. That if the plaintiff in a suit in the district court of the United States instituted under or in accordance with this act shall obtain judgment for a sum less than $50 the costs of such suit may be taxed equally between the parties plaintiff and defendant therein. If the recovery in such suit by the plaintiff shall be as much or a sum greater than $50 the entire costs shall be taxed against the defendant therein.

SEC. 5. That any citizen of a State may make complaint to the governor thereof, setting forth the facts which show a breach of the provisions of this act by any common carrier engaged in the business of transportation described in the first section hereof, and thereupon such governor, if he determines that it is proper and expedient for the people of the State that suit should be instituted, and is empowered by the laws of such State to institute suit for the determination of the questions and matters mentioned in the first section of this act, is hereby authorized to institute and prosecute a suit against any of the common carriers referred to in this act, in the name of the State of which he is governor, in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, for the recovery of any such demand, or for the recovery of any damages that such citizen may be entitled to recover or that the people of such State or of any defined locality in such State have suffered through the unlawful conduct of such common carrier. Such sums as may be recovered in such suits in the name of the State are to be at the disposal of the legislature of such State. The State instituting such suit shall be regarded in all respects as the plaintiff in the action: Provided, That such a suit shall not be brought in any State in a district court of the United States for any judicial district of the United States within such State; but such suit in a district court of the United States may be instituted in any other State or district of which the defendants are citizens, or in which any of them are liable to be sued in the district or any other courts of the United States.

SEC. 6. That the service of process upon any director or officer of a corporation, or company, mentioned in the first section of this act, at any place in which he is liable to be sued in any court of the United States, shall be sufficient service as to such corporation or company, and as to all the members thereof, to compel their appearance to abide by and perform its orders and the final judgment of the court when rendered.

SEC. 7. That nothing in this act contained shall be construed as depriving any person who sues in his own right and name from instituting any suit under its provisions, or any other suit, at law or in equity, in any State court or in any court of the United States, against any common carrier.

SEC. 8. That in all suits instituted under the provisions of this act, or in accordance therewith, against common carriers in the district courts of the United States the question of the reasonableness of rates or compensation demanded by or paid to a common carrier for the transportation of freights or passengers, and the question of the reasonableness of any preference given by a common carrier to shippers of freights or of passengers over other shippers or passengers, or to any place over any other place, shall be considered as mixed questions of law and fact, to be determined and decided by a court and jury.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, in all the great number of suggestions and propositions to regulate, by statute, the rates of compensation that common carriers may lawfully demand and receive for the transportation of passengers or property, there are two that can not escape final decision by the Supreme Court of the United States. Unless Congress cuts off from the parties to a suit the right of appeal or writ of error, for review by that court, of the judgments of inferior courts, such cases as are the subject-matter of this bill, they will reach that court and will be finally decided by it through some channel. But the journey will be slow.

It is by no means certain, if Congress should deny the right of appeal or writ of error in such cases, that the Supreme Court, in its constitutional power and right of review, prohibition, and mandamus over inferior tribunals, can not compel them to obey the Constitution of the United States.

But the occasion for the discussion of such a proposition is so very remote that I only allude to it to call the attention of the Senate to the supremacy of the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States as the final arbiter of all suits for all causes of action brought by a State of the Union in that court.

The two causes of action to which the provisions of this bill relate that I now have the honor to offer in the Senate involve the contract rights that may be claimed by carriers as being beyond the final control of the powers of Congress—rights that are so protected by the Constitution that Congress can not lawfully impair them if they are, in fact, reasonable and just—contract rights that can only be decided to be reasonable and just by the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction.

There is a contract, express or implied, in every lawful act or engagement of a common carrier in the transportation of passengers or freight. No phase or form of legislative enactment can extinguish this essential element that inheres in such engagements between a shipper and a common carrier.

A common carrier can not lawfully transport freights against the consent of the shipper. Such an act is a conversion of the property so transported. As to a passenger, such wrongful transportation against his will is a tort. If the transportation is with the consent of the parties it is lawful as to them, and the right to demand compensation and the amount of it is only governed by the reasonableness of the charge. If the amount of the compensation for such service is not settled by agreement, the law implies that it shall be reasonable. If it is fixed by agreement between the parties, the law, for reasons of public policy founded in justice, requires that the rate or compensation shall be reasonable; otherwise, the recovery for the service is limited to the quantum meruit, or the sum that is reasonably, and therefore justly, due to the carrier from the shipper, without regard to the price stated in the contract.

The test of reasonableness, which is an equitable phase or form of justice in the contracts of public carriers and other like employments, has grown out of a public policy that has the effect of law, and is practically inviolable. This public policy is based upon the necessity of placing restraints upon common carriers and some other classes of persons who, in virtue of their business occupations, in which not a great number of persons are usually engaged, have monopolistic advantages over the general community, and are yet indispensable to the success of commercial pursuits. If such advantages are not checked by active competition or by some principle of law that is of universal application to persons so employed in the service of the people, monopoly and extortion will necessarily exist, to the serious detriment of trade and commerce. These interests are sedulously guarded against such wrongs and evils in all civilized countries, and especially by the common law of England.

In official service the officer, great or small, who practices extortion is denounced by the common law and by many highly penal statutes as an enemy of society, and is weighted down by courts and juries with just and severe punishments.

The situation with which Congress is anxiously trying to deal at this time closely resembles extortion by public officials, and it deserves and requires the check and punishment of severe laws. It is difficult in the present state of public feeling on this subject to resist the inclination of lawmakers who are free from partialities to enact laws by State legislatures and by Congress to treat the officers of railroads, whether engaged in transportation among the States or within the States, as holding their offices in those corporations in trust for the people, as if they were governmental officers, by adoption of law. I am not quite sure that Congress and the State legislatures can not so regard their public service and hold them to the full responsibilities of such officers as are elected or chosen to the performance of governmental service and punish them for official extortion. But it is not yet necessary to make any new departure in legislation to reach this class of public extortioners. In the Elkins law there is as near an approval of this principle as is necessary at present, and if amendments to that excellent law are found necessary to prevent its evasion, Congress should make them.

Returning to the two questions with which this measure is intended to deal, they both arise out of the question of the reasonableness of contracts, express or implied, as to the compensation that common carriers may justly demand for transportation of goods or passengers, and the reasonableness of any discriminations or preferences in the rates or facilities of transportation as between different shippers or passengers or between different places on the same lines or routes of transportation.

Contracts, express or implied, are of the essence of such operations, and as contracts these matters are to be dealt with. I have selected these features of the situation that includes other evils, because they are very comprehensive in character, including other resulting or dependent evils, and because they are the most prominent and earnestly contested points that are being urged upon the consideration of Congress.

If these abuses can be corrected by Congressional legislation through methods that are not entirely new, and are not expensive to those who are being wronged by the railroad companies, and by decisions that are finally conclusive of all the questions involved, such a line of procedure must certainly engage the careful study and examination of Congress, as it will command the confidence of the people. I believe that such a result will follow the enactment of this bill into a law substantially as it is formulated.

While this measure removes some existing statutory difficulties to its successful operation, chiefly such as relate to the sum in controversy, as an element of jurisdiction in the district courts of the United States, and as to the amount of the judgment that carries the right of appeal or writ of error to remove causes in the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, and as to the costs of the suits in the cases provided for in this bill, there is not a principle of law upon which this bill rests that is not well established. It only brings to the support of justice methods and forms of procedure in the courts that are apparently being overlooked in our anxiety to deal summarily with widespread and dangerous combinations and extortionate monopolies that seriously oppress many of the productive, industrial, and commercial classes of our country.

The course of this proposed legislation in this bill is anticipated by and is marked out plainly in the history of the jurisprudence known as the "common law of England" from the beginning and also as it is extended and amplified in our courts and applied to the genius of our Government. It will stand as a reaffirmation of that great body of laws, both customary and statutory, and it is not in the way of any new and experimental system that has been presented for arriving summarily at results that are in the end the same that are reached by the provisions of this measure.

It can be stated with perfect confidence as a fact that no leading question that relates to the rights of shippers or railroads, or as to the rights, duties, and liabilities of the railroad companies that engage in the transportation of commerce and passengers among the States, can be finally settled until it has been passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States. As that is the bourne to which all such questions are destined and must finally reach, the choice of routes can only be a question of expediency. It is especially a fatuous mistake on the part of those who seem to believe in threatening the railroad companies into submission to the will of the people by summary proceedings of commissions or by harsh and aggressive legislation, that their measures can escape trial by jury in the courts of first instance or that they can escape the powers of prohibition, mandamus, or injunction of the Federal courts or the final judgment of the Supreme Court.

This bill is not designed to defeat or embarrass any such experimental methods, and need not be framed with such a purpose, for the reason that all legislation affecting the contracts of shipment and transportation between common carriers and their employers, when its validity or its effect is finally settled as to the principles of law involved in any such controversy, will be settled in the Supreme Court of the United States.

As we must all seek the same forum of final arbitrament, the question of the route we shall take to reach it is merely one of public convenience.

In the first section this bill declares a settled principle of common law by act of Congress. Why is this apparently conceded principle of law reaffirmed in this bill? There are several reasons why it is appropriate to the occasion, such as showing a common agreement among the States to settle its application to the provision in the Constitution for regulating commerce among the States, which is new in our present plan of government and was directly the reverse in the Articles of Confederation.

The prohibition of unreasonable charges or rates of transportation as being unlawful or extortionate by force of the statute law reaches to validity of an oppressive contract or bargain driven by a railroad company that has an opportunity to force a shipper into terms who has no other means of reaching a market with his produce. This form of duress, when it is practiced by a railroad company, as, for example, in the shipment of fruits from the Pacific States to the Atlantic States, greatly impairs, if it does not check or destroy, an industry of enormous value.

In the English common law precedents may not be found to meet the case of shipments to very distant markets of perishable fruits, and it might be answered to a suit for redress that the common law does not impose the doctrine of reasonable rates upon a carrier who might undertake to carry and deliver such goods in good condition at points so unreasonably distant. Our present condition as to transportation to great distances is so altered that the common-law rule as to the reasonableness of freight charges by common carriers should be extended by statute over the entire country.

As for the common law of England, the Supreme Court does not admit that it necessarily obtains as a rule of decision in our Federal courts, and some of the States have never adopted the common law. Without such a declaration, in some form, the decree or rule of reasonableness as applied to the freight charges of common carriers should be uniform throughout our Union and all of our possessions; but it may not be so held in all the State courts, and it should be the general law of the land.

Such a declaration by Congress will establish the rule as one of public policy in respect of interstate commerce and will necessitate the participation of juries in the law courts in ascertaining the facts, at least, which properly enter into and properly control the question of the reasonableness of such demands, which is the basis of their lawfulness.

The prohibition of any other than reasonable charges by common carriers of interstate commerce will establish, also, a predicate for penal legislation in cases where the intent of the carrier is extortionate.

There is a necessity for such laws that grows out of the enormous powers of railroad companies in controlling oppressively the handling of the commerce of the people. Their powers are so great and the just control of them is so difficult that if it was permitted by the Constitution Congress would institute, in the place of the common law, a statutory code that would extend to every question among the vast number of new questions that have arisen and are to be settled by new applications to them of the rules and principles of the common law.

The frightful tendency of such a code, shaped and controlled by partisan politics as it would be to the end of government ownership or the manipulation of all railroads and all lines of ocean transportation by acts of Congress, is quite great enough to admonish the friends of our present form of government that such a departure would be fatal to it.

The new situation, not contemplated when this great plan of government was ordained, that common carriers have become the exclusive owners of the routes over which interstate commerce is conducted, accounts for all the difficulties we are now endeavoring to provide against. The navigable water courses are still in the ownership of the people, and are free to all, like the ordinary public roads, but the railroads and the reluctance of Congress in keeping the water courses open to safe and convenient navigation have well-nigh destroyed their usefulness to the people.

The railroads have the field and the mastery and, as to the justice and reasonableness of their exactions, the courts alone can afford any real security to the people. The right of trial by jury as to the reasonableness of such exactions is the true palladium of the safety, the rights, and the liberties of the people as against the corporations. I say the rights and the liberties of the people because the seventh amendment of the Constitution was ordained to preserve the right of trial by jury in all actions upon contracts, express or implied, as well as for many other purposes. It was a barrier, made necessary by the aggressions of the great English judges, against the exclusion of juries from their courts as an embarrassment of justice.

The Anglo-Saxon founders and builders of the common law resisted these aggressions of the great chancellors of England with trembling and yielding opposition, and with little success, but the American people interposed the seventh amendment as an inviolable barrier to the aggressive spirit of the English judges and placed their right of trial by jury among the essential liberties of the people.

I am a devotee to the right of trial by jury, esteeming it among our most valuable liberties, and I oppose every measure yet offered in Congress, or that may be offered, to have the reasonableness of freight and passenger rates settled by a commission, or by a court from which trial by jury is excluded, and every such measure that attempts to define by statute, or by a special tribunal acting in virtue of a statute, what are reasonable rates and to make such definitions conclusive upon the courts and the people.

Trial of such questions by juries is the only safe and proper method of reaching just results.

The railroads are public servants of all the people, and their usefulness is so great and so universal that the people can not afford, with justice to themselves, to inflict any serious injustice upon them, and will not do so through their representatives in the jury box.

There is also an element of equity in every controversy in the courts as to the reasonableness of railroad freight rates and preferences in transportation that appeals to the judicial conscience. Such a sense of justice and right is not more completely exercised by any tribunal than it is in a law court, of which a jury is a constituent and indispensable part. This is a grand theme for the consideration of an American Congress, which I must leave to the more enlightened judgment of the Senate, without further comment at this time.

This bill aims to place a remedy, by suit in a district court of the United States, in reach of every person whose rights are violated by unreasonable charges or unreasonable preferences by any common carrier engaged in transportation among the States, without regard to the amount that may be recovered in the suit, where the sum claimed by the plaintiff is at least $50. And if the sum recovered is less than $50 the court is required to divide the cost equally between the parties, plaintiff and defendant.

This provision is intended to create some degree of equality between a poor suitor who has a just ground of complaint and a rich and powerful corporation that has wronged a citizen.

The inducement that is thus offered to several or many persons who are interested in the questions presented in the complaint to assist the plaintiff in bearing the burdens of the litigation strongly recommends this feature of the bill to my support.

In one such suit it is possible to settle questions that affect extensive communities.

The appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States in such cases is also required to be exercised under the existing general laws and regulations without regard to the sum claimed in the complaint or recovered in the judgment by either of the parties to such suit, and all of the courts are required to advance such causes on their dockets, unless the public convenience is thereby obstructed.

This plan seems to me to be quite sufficient to reach conclusive results with reasonable speed. But there is to me a much more attractive feature. It is to leave in the hands of the people the initiative as to the proceedings that they believe are necessary to secure justice to them, instead of leaving such matters to the discretionary and arbitrary determination of law officers of the Government.

The advantage and justice of such a provision needs not to be discussed before legislators who have the experience in such matters, as Senators must have had. When a just cause is denied a hearing by reason of an adverse governmental policy, or through the partiality or indifference of a law officer of the Government, the situation is even worse than if a stranger sat in the seat of judgment.

The next feature of the bill is a provision that brings the States into active cooperation with the Federal Government in giving judicial protection to the rights of the people who have grievances to redress against interstate common carriers, and, likewise, to protect such carriers against popular indignation and hasty injustice in consequence of their conduct in conducting such transportation. It empowers the governor of a State to bring suit in the district court of the United States in another State, and in the name of the State he represents, based upon causes of action such as are described in the first section of the bill, when he is thereto requested by a citizen, or citizen of the State of which he is governor, to whom the cause of action thereby enures. The request of the citizen to whom the cause of action belongs, that the State should bring suit in its own name against the carrier, transfers the cause of action to the State and makes the State the party plaintiff when the governor, being thereunto empowered by a law of the State, consents to bring such suit. The use to which the recovery shall be applied, if a judgment is recovered, is to be declared by a law of the State, and if it is not so declared the recovery will be for the use of the State.

The jurisdiction of the district court of the United States to entertain a suit by a State against the citizen or corporation of a different State is clear under section 2 of Article III of the Constitution, "that the judicial power shall be extended to all cases in law and equity arising under the Constitution, the laws of the United States, * * * and to controversies * * * between a State and citizens of another State."

In all such cases "the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction."

If this bill becomes a law, the right of trial by jury in the cases provided for in the first section arises under the provisions of the seventh amendment. It is also "a case arising under a law of Congress" that enables the governor of a State to sue on a cause of action in the name of the State, on the request of a citizen to whom the cause of action enures or belongs. It is also a controversy "between a State and the citizens of another State" where the citizens of one State are wronged or oppressed, as to interstate commerce, by the citizens or corporations of another State.

In any of these characters, and for the adjudication of the Federal questions that are stated in the provisions of this act, the State has the right to sue in the United States district courts of other States, they being so empowered by this act and by the laws of such State. No plan, it seems to me, could be more propitious for the control of the enormous powers of the railroad corporations and of the navigation companies and combines than through the cooperation of the States and the Federal Government in the manner presented in this bill, and nothing could more effectively promote the general welfare.

It is a painful and alarming fact that a political issue that was joined between great contending parties in the first years after the adoption of the Constitution, and was at daggers drawn as a party question in Jefferson's candidacy for the office of President, and reached its climax in the time of the great triumvirate—Calhoun, Clay, and Webster—should still be the cause of suspicious jealousy between the States and the Federal Government. And whatever may tend to bring our country under the benign influence of a more generous regard for all the rights and powers of the Federal Government and of these forty-five sovereign States should be welcomed with joy by every true American.

In the presence of the great questions respecting the powers and duties of the common carriers, that have become the greatest combination of wealth and commercial power that has ever existed and are a controlling factor in political contests, it is our duty to bring about the friendly cooperation of the States and the Federal Government, all of whose combined powers will be needed in the adjustment of these new conditions, that owe their origin almost exclusively to the acts of State legislatures in the promotion of commercial rivalry between the States.

If Congress should be so wise and so fortunate as to check the power and subdue these combined aggressions of interstate common carriers, there will still follow a retinue of questions that will breed still more dangerous contentions between the States and Congress. The States can and will control the corporations created by them as to commercial transportation within their respective limits, but that field will be too narrow for any national benefit, and its limits will be constantly contracting. The States will attempt to tax the property of their own corporations and to forfeit their charters for violation of their charter duties and of State laws; but they will be put down by the laws of Congress if the exertion of such positive rights shall in any manner interfere with interstate commerce or with any authority they may choose to exercise over the instrumentalities of commerce, which are already being defined as including everything that is appurtenant to a railroad, from its right of way and roadbed and tracks up to palace cars and "Jim Crow" cars and leased cars and refrigerator cars and all their paraphernalia, and all their crews, from engineers and conductors down to the scrub women.

In this wide and constantly expanding field of conflict there will be no end of controversy until the Federal Government has become the owner of all the connecting railroads in the United States. When that is accomplished the Government of the country will be in the hands of the common carriers and their officials, and Congress will only register their edicts. No election will be carried against their nominees.

If it is possible to point out a constitutional forum provided by the builders of the Republic that has the power to bring the States and the Federal Government into harmonious action in conducting this tremendous task no man will be accused of an immodest ambition who will venture to perform so high a duty to the country.

A brief consideration of the fact that such a forum was established in the Constitution and of the reasons for its existence and of the breadth of its powers should not be heard with impatience or rejected because it may dispense with the consideration of some favorite plan of procedure that others are advocating with honest zeal and great ability. Let us not reject any remedial legislation that promises good results and is not in conflict with the Constitution.

I do not object to any law that will reach the evils we are trying to suppress if it is foursquare with the Constitution. In the end all the measures that may be enacted by Congress on this subject must pass the ordeal of final trial as to their constitutionality in the Supreme Court of the United States, to stand or fall by the judgment of that great tribunal.

While I may support other measures that are offered, I will give the preference to the measure that is the most direct, the most speedy, with the least cost to the people and the least embarrassed with doubts, and is broad enough to cover the real causes of the evils that we are trying to cure.

This is no proper occasion for the exploitation of party politics, for trying to get the lead of excited people for party purposes, or to gratify a prurient ambition to sit in the focal rays of "the lime light," which is the coveted apotheosis of the demagogue.

Next to the sovereign will of the people, the greatest and most potent power of the Government ordained in the Constitution is the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States. It is a court in which alone sovereigns or their representatives are the complainants, and in which a hearing in that character is never refused on account of the character of the party summoned to answer at its bar if the complaint is for causes occurring within the jurisdiction of the United States, or on account of the sum in controversy or the character of the suit if it comports with the peace and dignity of the United States and with its laws that are constitutionally enacted.

The original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States depends upon the character or office of one of the parties to the suit, either as plaintiff or defendant, and is limited to two classes of cases, as follows:

> In all cases affecting ambassadors or other public ministers or consuls, and those in which a State should be a party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. (Constitution, section 2 of Article III, second paragraph.)

The force of this supreme ordinance is intensified and its scope is more clearly defined in the second clause of section 2 of Article III, as follows:

> In all other cases before mentioned—

As in cases of "controversies between State and citizens of another State"— > the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as Congress shall make.

When the suit of a State has relation only to its sovereign, governmental rights, powers, or duties, or when it chooses to invoke the aid of the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States in a case in controversy with its own citizens or with the citizens of another State, or with another State, or with an ambassador or other public minister or consul, or in cases "in which a State may be a party," as in the case of the removal of such a suit pending in the district court of the United States into the Supreme Court for trial on the motion of either party, it is within the option of the State to bring its suit in the Supreme Court, at least as to all parties defendant, except ambassadors and other public ministers and consuls.

The original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States had an august origin and was clothed with its supremacy by the authority and right of thirteen sovereign American States, now increased to forty-five in number, that were recognized by Great Britain, their former sovereign, in the treaty of peace, and by other great powers as being each a sovereign and independent State. That treaty was made with each of the thirteen States, by its name and in its independent character, through their diplomatic agents, who were chosen and commissioned by their common representatives, the Congress of the Confederation. After years of anxious conference and discussion the delegates of these separate States met in convention and ordained the Constitution of the United States, which was submitted to and finally ratified by all these sovereign powers.

In their delegation of powers to the new government they cast about to devise and create a supreme arbiter of all controversies of a judicial nature that might arise between them, or between a State and a citizen of another State, and as to foreign ambassadors and other ministers and consuls.

Probably it was not the purpose of the Constitution to create a tribunal to decide any political controversy between the States, or between a State and the citizens of another State, or as to foreign countries, except as to the interpretation of treaties, which function is included in the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, but in all other controversies such a tribunal was necessary to settle questions that might arise where a sovereign power was a party.

In this great conception of an arbitral tribunal there was the assurance of peace, with justice and honor, and the further assurance that the citizen, when sued by a State, should have the safeguard of a tribunal that represents all the States.

The sovereign State enters this tribunal as a party to a suit as a demandant of justice for its people, and the court decides upon the convenient form of procedure to reach the merits of the case. It may proceed as in equity cases, or as in common-law cases, and may call a jury to decide the facts, as has been several times done. It may formulate writs and processes to meet the exigencies of the litigation, and impose costs according to its judicial discretion upon the litigants. It is not confined in the exercise of its jurisdiction to statutory provisions of law, either as to the scope of its powers or as to the method of their exercise or of compelling obedience to its decrees, except by the principles of the Constitution of the United States, which the justices are sworn to observe, protect, and defend. Its decrees are final—without appeal. No other court has shared in its judgment or participated in its opinions, or can do so.

In a suit brought by a State in the Supreme Court of the United States, asking the exercise of its original jurisdiction for the correction of abuses by a railroad company, in the demand of unreasonable freight rates, or in giving unreasonable preferences to certain shippers, it requires no trained mind to see that such original jurisdiction would include in its rightful authority all the judicial powers of the court to establish justice in that and in all other cases of a like character. Such a decision from that tribunal would be alike conclusive on all courts and legislatures and on all interstate and common carriers.

That high tribunal would not exercise legislative powers to prescribe freight rates to all railroads, for that is not within the competence of any judicial tribunal. Neither can Congress prescribe to the Supreme Court that, in the exercise of its original jurisdiction, it shall consider a freight rate, established by its act, as being just and reasonable, for political reasons or any reason of public policy. Congress has no power to compel the Supreme Court, in the exercise of its original jurisdiction to follow its decisions, by statute, upon the construction or validity of any contract that was valid when the Constitution was ordained. And no tribunal, constituted by act of Congress, can settle, judicially, that a freight rate is unreasonable and unjust and prescribe, legislatively, that a different rate shall, in the future, apply to all railroads; for that is an unconstitutional blending of the powers of the separate departments of the Government.

In the present state of our organic law no separate department into which the powers of the Government are distributed can have or exercise all the requisite authority to adjudicate upon, and to legislate so as to establish and execute a uniform law to prescribe the charges of common carriers that shall be held to be reasonable or just, as an absolute rule of law.

The present system, much as it may be criticised or condemned, is safer than any result that is to be expected from such a tearing up of the solid foundations of the Republic.

Trial by jury is the institution by which natural justice will in a large and uniform method be introduced into the judgment of the courts in deciding upon the reasonableness of freight rates. This we have, and the courts will see to it that it is not abrogated.

If a State prefers to bring its suit in a court that can not render judgment except upon the verdict of a jury and to resort to the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court for the correction of errors, it will bring its suit in the district court of the United States. If a State prefers to invoke the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States, where it is in the discretion of the court to summon a jury, it will sue in that court and in such form of civil action as it may direct.

If it is necessary to sue every corporation in the lines of transportation from Portland, Me., to Galveston, Tex., or from Miami, Fla., to Seattle, Wash., for the purpose of settling a freight rate or contract in which they are all interested through a common agreement as common carriers, such corporations, or the States under whose laws any of them are acting, may be summoned as defendants in a single suit in the Supreme Court of the United States, exercising its original jurisdiction.

The citizen, suing in his own right and in his own name, can go into a district court of the United States with his suit against a railroad company, where he will find a jury to pass upon his claim, if it is as much as $50, and will divide the costs with his powerful antagonist if he obtains a verdict for a sum that is less that $50.

Some jurists are in doubt as to whether the right of a State to sue in the Supreme Court of the United States and invoke its original jurisdiction is not exclusive of its right to bring a suit in any other Federal court.

I take it that this question depends upon the character of the cause of action upon which the suit is founded and not upon the sovereign character in which the State acts in bringing the suit.

I think the rule on this subject is well stated and supported by authority in the language of a careful and able law writer, which I will quote:

> Where the character of a cause gives appellate jurisdiction, and the character of the party (an ambassador or State) gives original jurisdiction, the appellates' jurisdiction is not thereby ousted.

Citing Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheaton, 392 et seq.; Martin v. Hunter, 1 Wheaton, 337; Curtis Commentaries, S. 109; Story's Constitution, S. 1697 to 1792.

The existence of this doubt has caused the insertion in the bill of a separate section providing for suits, in certain cases, by States, in the Supreme Court of the United States.

It could not have been intended by the framers of the Constitution that a State should be excluded from the right of appeal to the Supreme Court in all cases, and that being so restricted it could only sue in the Supreme Court of the United States on such cases of action as relate to its rights, powers, and duties as a government.

The Supreme Court, in the exercise of its original jurisdiction, is a supreme council of state, discretion, and judgment, as to the right of the matter in controversy between a State, representing its people, and other States and their citizens, corporations, or municipalities. It can annul or sustain acts of Congress and of State legislatures, and it can issue mandates to the executive officers of the States and of the Federal Government to restrain them from the usurpation of unlawful powers, or the abuse of lawful authority. In that court only the States can demand to be heard as plaintiffs, representing citizens or the body politic whose rights are in jeopardy.

I am glad to quote the following statement on this point from the distinguished constitutional lawyer of Alabama, Hon. Hannis Taylor, LL. D., who has the sincere respect of the American bar for his abilities and his learning:

> WASHINGTON, D. C., January 8, 1906.
> MY DEAR SENATOR: I have been reflecting upon the interesting question propounded in your letter of the 3d instant. By reference to my book on the Jurisdiction and Procedure of the Supreme Court of the United States, I find that I have stated the matter in this way:
> "23. Original jurisdiction not exclusive.—In settling the doctrine in Marbury v. Madison that the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court can not be enlarged by Congress the court went so far as to deny the right of that body to give appellate jurisdiction where the Constitution confers original. That proposition was modified, however, a few years later in a suit in which Virginia and one of its own citizens were parties (Cohen v. Virginia, 6 Wheat., 397, 398; 5 L. ed., 289), the question at issue involving the construction of an act of Congress. When it was argued that as the Supreme Court had original jurisdiction in cases in which a State is a party, that fact excluded its appellate jurisdiction, the court held otherwise on the ground that the original jurisdiction in cases in which a State is a party refers only to those cases in which the Supreme Court obtains jurisdiction by reason of the character of the parties, and not at all to those cases in which the Federal jurisdiction attaches, because the question involved arises under the Constitution, treaties, or laws of the United States."
> My test, therefore, supports the view you now put forward. In looking at the record in Cohen v. Virginia I find that Mr. Pinkney said:
> "4. Lastly. It is insisted, for the defendant in error, that this court has no jurisdiction in the present case, because a State is a party to the original controversy which the writ of error brings before the court. That the jurisdiction of this court in all cases where a State is a party is original, and therefore it can not have original jurisdiction in this case. The obvious answer to this argument is that the jurisdiction now claimed does not arise under that part of the Constitution which gives original jurisdiction to the Supreme Court in cases in which a State is a party; but the jurisdiction is asserted under that clause which gives the Federal judiciary cognizance of all cases arising under the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States, without regard to the character of the parties."
> That view the court adopted. In a note to the case in the Lawyers' Cooperative Edition South Carolina Reports I find this:
> "Federal courts have jurisdiction of cases arising under the laws and Constitution of the United States whoever may be parties, and even when a State is a party and the proceedings a writ of error to the State court."
> As ever, faithfully, yours,
> HANNIS TAYLOR.
> Hon. JOHN T. MORGAN,
> United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Evidently the power to sue in the Supreme Court was a privilege extended to or reserved by the States that created that court, in consideration of the fact that they were independent sovereignties, as to each other, and could not properly be compelled to sue in courts subordinate to other States, or in Federal courts within the limits of other States, whose judges and jurors might be controlled by local influences. There is no restriction as to the nature of the cause of action, or as to the amount in controversy, that affects the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court when a State appears at its bar to demand justice.

There is no attempt in this bill to do more than to qualify a State as a plaintiff who may bring a suit and recover for the wrongful acts of common carriers of interstate commerce, as to freight rates and preferences done to the citizens thereof.

This declaration does not add to the exclusive classes that may sue in the Supreme Court of the United States under its original jurisdiction. It only defines certain cases in which the State may sue as the real party in interest. When a sovereign State appears in that court as a plaintiff in an action it would be assumed, most probably, that the State has authority to control the demand sued upon in its own name and that it has the duty of giving aid to its citizens in obtaining justice as to all their constitutional rights and equities in the claim sued upon. Such is the universal rule of international law under which the governments that are parties to treaties and conventions for the settlement of private claims alleged to be owing to their citizens or subjects assume a right to have a decree or award made to them, as governments, in case of recovery, whereby the claim of the real owner of the demand or cause of action is merged in the finding of the commission and is barred, as to a further recovery by the claimant, although the real owner never receives compensation from his own government for the amount of the award recovered by it. But this rule of international law may not extend to the States of the Union that have no interstate code, unless Congress declares their right to represent their ciitzens in all cases in which the States may sue in the Supreme Court of the United States.

It is a cautionary provision in this bill intended to prevent a failure of justice.

This bill does not rest solely on that principle of international law, although it might be done safely. It goes further and requires a law of a State or the petition of the claimant made to the governor to enable him to accept control of the claim as governor and to sue upon it in the name of the State. This is intended as a security to the defendant against further suit in any court upon the claim that is sued upon in the name of the State in any Federal court having jurisdiction to hear and determine it upon its merits.

In such original suits in the Supreme Court of the United States the court would not be obstructed by rules of practice, statute laws, or precedents as to the consolidation of suits or as to setting down for hearing many suits involving like questions or other questions depending for their decisions on the same or like principles, so that the speedy and final settlement of a wide variety of cases and questions might be considered and decided at the same hearing. In the vast amount of litigation that is likely to arise out of any view of this sea of railroad troubles it is well that we have a court of supreme constitutional powers, that no legislature can fetter with rules of procedure, that can take original cognizance at the suit of a State of any and all questions of a civil character in respect of common carriers of interstate commerce and settle them speedily and economically to all concerned.

I earnestly appeal to all Senators, who desire to compose these public troubles that threaten to become public calamities, to give earnest consideration to the great powers provided for such emergencies in the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States that is created by the Constitution.

I can not look forward hopefully to any event of the future that will more benignly bless our country than will be realized when the States and our Supreme Court take up these vexed questions and threatening conditions and work together patriotically for their speedy and just settlement.

Congress can not compass this great national evil by the exertion of all its powers, with all its wisdom, and the occupation of all its time in devising and executing schemes of legislation. In its power to define and provide for the punishment of crime it can, in a large degree, prevent extortion and other abuses of justice and public policy by railroads and navigation companies, but that phase of the subject is not touched by this measure. A predicate for such legislation will be established in its prohibitory clauses, if this bill is enacted into a law, that will serve as the broad foundation for the punishment of such crimes.

I do not agree with those who essay to cure these public evils through Congressional legislation in fixing rates of transportation that must at last pass under the judgment of the Supreme Court, weighted with a heavy load of intermediate embarrassments, as to the constitutionality of the laws and of the tribunals created to administer them; but this bill does not obstruct their plans in the slightest degree. It is only an additional way or facility for reaching the same results, that should be opened to the service and assistance of the people.

It should be the desire of all that controversies between the railroads and the people should never take on a political aspect. It is not the right or the province of political leaders to force into partisan caucuses or conventions or into the ballot box questions of such immense magnitude, which are purely judicial in their character and can only be finally settled by courts of justice.

The measure I have the honor to offer is intended to open the doors of the courts of justice to the people where they can get speedy redress for their grievances on terms that, to a great extent at least, equalize the powers of litigants, so that the rich and powerful corporations will not be able to force weaker men to the wall, and thus enforce, through the delays and costs of litigation, that power of duress and oppression which their combinations are employing to increase their power and riches and to oppress the people.

If the States and the Federal Government act in concert, through their courts, to repress these evil conditions they will cease, and the railroads of the country, instead of being oppressors of the people, will become the useful and honored instrumentalities of good government and of progress in our splendid country.

It is worthy of most serious examination, whether the needful reform in present conditions should not begin with the people and the States in the courts of the country, under the final supervision of the Supreme Court of the United States, to which such questions must come for final settlement, rather than with Congress, where no great economic question can escape entanglement with partisan politics.

In my judgment it is better for the public health to drink the pure waters from their fountains rather than from the contaminated brooks after they have wandered through the marshes and infections of political camps.

I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

A bill (H. R. 58) to prevent the unlawful wearing of the badge or insignia of the Grand Army of the Republic or other soldier organizations;

A bill (H. R. 4459) authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to make regulations respecting the rights and privileges of the fish wharf;

A bill (H. R. 4461) to provide for the abatement of nuisances in the District of Columbia by the Commissioners of said District, and for other purposes; and MONETARY AGREEMENTS WITH PANAMA AND OTHER GOVERNMENTS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. BAILEY, as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate, That the Finance Committee of the Senate be instructed, and it is hereby instructed, to inquire—

1. Into all of the facts and circumstances concerning certain monetary and exchange agreements made by the Secretary of War with the Government of Panama and others, and to report such facts and circumstances to the Senate, together with their opinion as to the authority under which said agreements were made; and

2. Into all of the facts and circumstances under which certain bonds of the Panama Railway Company were recently sold, and report such facts and circumstances to the Senate, together with their opinion as to the authority for the sale of said bonds.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President, the Committee on Interoceanic Canals has under consideration the subject-matter of the second paragraph of the resolution, and I suggest to the Senator from Texas the propriety of amending his resolution by striking out that part thereof.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, when the resolution was introduced the Senate had not received the report of the Secretary of War, which report relates to the sale of the Panama railroad bonds. I recognize that it is not desirable to have two committees of the Senate concurrently pursuing an inquiry with reference to the same subject, and I have no particular care that the Finance Committee shall pursue that inquiry. If there be no other objection to the resolution, I am entirely willing to accept the suggestion of the Senator from South Dakota; and I ask leave to strike out the second subdivision of the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas has the absolute right to amend his resolution by striking out the second subdivision.

Mr. BAILEY. I will ask the clerks to strike out that part of it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be changed as the Senator desires. The question is on agreeing to the resolution offered by the Senator from Texas, as modified by him.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

AFFAIRS OF MOROCCO.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The resolutions submitted by Mr. BACON yesterday was read, as follows:

Whereas it has of late been announced in the public press, both of Europe and the United States, that for the purpose of considering certain grave questions relative to the commercial and political affairs of Morocco, and of reaching an agreement and determination thereof, the governments of the leading powers of Europe, including Germany, France, Great Britain, Italy, Austria, and Spain, have agreed and arranged to hold in the near future, through delegates to be appointed by each of said Governments, a conference at Algeciras, in Spain, and that the Government of the United States has, by said European Governments been invited to participate through duly appointed delegates in the said conference; and

Whereas it is further announced in the public press that the President of the United States has, in compliance with said invitation, appointed delegates of the United States to and in said conference; and

Whereas the questions at issue relative to the affairs of Morocco, and the relation of European governments thereto, are reputed to be of such gravity, and the antagonistic demands of European governments to be so acute as to endanger the peace of Europe, as is evidenced by the publicly announced preparations for war in the dispositions of troops and fleets, and in the gathering of war material by several of said European powers, and as is also evidenced by press dispatches from the capitals of said powers, such as the following, which have been received and published in the newspapers of the United States, to wit:

"PARIS, December 31.

"Sensational papers here continue to publish lengthy telegrams from frontier towns reporting extraordinary activity of the military authorities. The evening edition of the Intransigeant to-day reproduces the alleged declaration of a superior Belgian staff officer concerning the military precautions Belgium is taking in order to preserve neutrality, and also a lengthy special dispatch showing the defensive strength of the main frontier points.

"Deputy Jaures reflects the pessimistic view of the socialistic element, writing in the Humanite that 'the antagonism in which France and Germany enter the Morocco conference causes a terrible uneasiness to weigh upon Europe, as the slightest untoward incident might unchain a catastrophe.' Most of the serious journals take a more conservative view, although all recognize the existence of widespread feelings of inquietude."

"LONDON, January 6.

"According to official information received in London from Berlin, Germany not only demands that all the powers shall participate in the execution of reforms in Morocco, but that the work of watching the frontier shall be divided among them, thus realizing the fears expressed by an official of the foreign office in an interview last Thursday that the German delegates might insist on regulations clashing with what France considers her special privileges—for instance, the policing of the frontier.

"If Germany persists in this attitude in the conference, it is believed a most serious situation will arise, as France is certain to resist, and Great Britain will support France. The British Government, while believing the conference will finally reach a satisfactory settlement, realizes that persistence by Germany in her demands will cause irritation which will require all the efforts of the delegates to remove, and in this it expects the support of the United States, Spain, and Italy."

"ROME, January 6.

"Interest here in the conference on Moroccan reforms is growing. This is due to the predominant position that Italy will assume because of the importance of her delegate, the Marquis Visconti Venosta, who, when he was Italian minister of foreign affairs, concluded an agreement with France by which Italy abandoned her claims on Morocco in favor of France. This agreement was completed later by Foreign Minister Prinetti, who pledged Italy's help to France in Morocco, receiving in exchange the help of France in Tripoli.

"At that time Germany had shown no interest in Morocco, while Italy considered herself free to so act, Morocco not being included in the agreement of the triple alliance concerning the equilibrium of the Mediterranean. Now, Germany, it is said, maintains that any question, even if it were not contemplated by the triple alliance, comes within the terms of the treaty, and that if Germany is attacked by any other power the other two members of the triple alliance—Austria and Italy—are compelled to assist her with arms. Thus the situation of Italy in the conference is becoming more delicate, as the conference may lead to war, though the prospects at present point toward peace;" and

Whereas our only legitimate concern with Moroccan affairs relates to the very limited commerce between that country and our own and is in no matter connected with the grave political controversy which has been carried on for some time past between Germany on the one side and France and England on the other as to the future political control of Morocco, it having been the settled policy of this Government since its foundation to abstain from taking part in such political controversies between European nations: It is therefore

I. Resolved by the Senate, That the President be respectfully requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to furnish the Senate with copies of the following papers:

(a) Such invitation or invitations as were received by this Government to participate in said conference, and of the reply or the replies of this Government thereto;

(b) Of any protocol, agreement, or other paper setting forth the objects of said conference, and the subjects with which it is expected to deal;

(c) Of all instructions sent to the delegates designated to represent this Government at said conference, with the names of said delegates;

(d) Of any agreement fixing the time and place for the meeting of said conference.

II. It is further resolved, That the President be respectfully requested to inform the Senate whether under the terms of said invitation and the acceptance thereof, or under the instructions given to said delegates on the part of the United States, they are limited in their authority to a participation in the deliberations, judgments, and awards of said conference to questions concerning commercial and business matters in which the Government and people of the United States have an interest, either present or prospective; or whether the said delegates on the part of the United States have authority to participate in the deliberations, judgments, or awards of said conference relative to the political affairs of Morocco and her political relations to one or more of the said foreign governments, and to the respective rights and powers of any one or more of said foreign governments relative thereto.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia desires to have the resolutions referred to the Foreign Relations Committee without discussion, I have no objection to make. If they are to be discussed, I think I shall be obliged to move that we discuss them behind closed doors.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, it is the right, not to say the privilege, of the Senator from Massachusetts, if he sees fit to do so, to move that this discussion be behind closed doors. Why he should do so I am at a loss to determine. This is not a matter which relates to a treaty——

Mr. LODGE. I shall take pleasure in explaining to the Senator why I do it after the doors are closed.

Mr. BACON. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I have the floor. The Senator from Massachusetts has not made the motion.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Georgia has not the floor against that motion.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Massachusetts did not make a motion. He said——

Mr. LODGE. Then I make the point of order, and move that the doors be closed.

Mr. BACON. I am entitled to be heard on the point of order. I have the floor.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no; I beg the Senator's pardon. I ask him to read the rule.

Mr. BACON. I was not proceeding to discuss the resolutions, Mr. President. I was speaking of the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts being made in the alternative, if the Senator had permitted me to proceed to that extent.

The Senator had said that if I would consent to the reference of the resolutions to the Committee on Foreign Relations without discussion he would not object to action upon them at this time, but that if I would not so consent he thought he would at some future time—I presume in the near future—move that the discussion be had behind closed doors. If the Senator had made that motion of course I would have been out of order in saying anything whatever, provided the motion had a second, which I suppose it would have had. I am quite familiar with the rule to which the Senator kindly refers me.

I was proceeding to say that I was at a loss to understand why, when that emergency should develop into an actuality, the Senator would be induced to make such a motion, as this was not a proceeding which related in any manner to a treaty, but to a matter in which the entire public of the United States——

Mr. LODGE. That is the precise question which I think ought to be discussed behind closed doors.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the doors of the Senate be closed. Is there a second?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH. I second the motion.

Mr. BACON. I do not understand that the Senator had made the motion or that he now has the floor for that purpose.

Mr. LODGE. The motion can be made at any time. I have been taken off the floor in the middle of a speech to have such a motion made.

Mr. BACON. I think the Senator is quite right. I see the situation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the Senator from Massachusetts, while having the floor in his own right, to move that the doors be closed. There is a second, and the galleries will be cleared and the doors closed.

The doors were thereupon closed, and at the expiration of three hours and fifty minutes were reopened; and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 10, 1906, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 9, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. OLMSTED in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3—Philippine tariff bill.

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Chairman, in discussing the bill now under consideration I shall not weary the committee with citations of a vast mass of statistics. I prefer to discuss this bill and to base my opposition to the measure upon what I conceive to be the fundamental principles involved in its consideration. I shall undoubtedly have something to say about the possible effect of this legislation upon the beet-sugar industry, an industry of vital importance to the district which I have the honor to represent upon the floor of this House. In the First Congressional district of Colorado there are to-day seven beet-sugar factories in operation. These factories have all been erected during the past seven or eight years, and, in my judgment, they stand as monuments to the wisdom of the sugar schedule of the Dingley tariff bill. Deeply interested as are my people in that industry, both because of the pride they feel in the present proportion that it has assumed in the industrial life of the State and because of the hope that they entertain for its future growth and development, I prefer to base my opposition to the passage of this bill upon more fundamental grounds than even the selfish interest, if you please, of the people of my district in their local industry.

I approach the discussion of this question, Mr. Chairman, as a protectionist and as a Republican. As a protectionist I have been taught to believe, and I still believe, notwithstanding the speech of the eminent chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, that it is within the power and it is the duty of the National Government to protect and encourage and to uphold the growth of the infant industries of this land where they are capable of such development, and to protect American labor against the cheap labor of alien people, who do not live according to the standards of American life and American citizenship.

As a Republican I have been taught to believe, and I still believe, notwithstanding the views that have been announced upon this floor in the advocacy of this measure, that when the Constitution of the United States was ratified a new nation came into existence, clothed with all the inherent powers of nationality and fully equipped for the discharge of its duties, both domestic and international.

I believe that this measure is Democratic in principle and in theory upon both of these fundamental principles. I believe that if it shall be enacted into law it will mark a departure from Republican principles and Republican theories upon both of these principles that are fundamental to the existence of the Republican party. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I was very much amazed the other day when I listened to the argument of the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. PAYNE]. I was amazed to hear fall from the lips of so strong a protectionist as our chairman has always been the statement that American farm labor, receiving $1.50 and $2 a day, could successfully compete with the cheapest paid labor on the face of the earth—Philippine labor. I was more amazed, sir, when the chairman based that argument upon the proposition that American labor engaged in the beet-sugar industry did not receive a larger proportion of the wealth that it produced than does Philippine labor. I deny the statement, Mr. Chairman. I submit, sir, that the statistics are abundant to disprove that statement, and to establish the fact indisputably that American labor is not only paid more in dollars and cents, but that it is relatively paid more in the production of the wealth that it produces than any labor upon the face of the earth. I was not surprised when yesterday afternoon the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN], in making an attack upon the tariff system of the United States, referred to that argument of the chairman of our Ways and Means Committee. It seems to me that it does not require a prophet or the son of a prophet to predict that in the future when attacks are made upon our tariff system the speech of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. PAYNE] will be the speech to which the opponents of that system will turn for comfort and for ammunition. If any attack is to be made upon our tariff system as the result of the agitation of this question, all true protectionists should remember that in this House the attack is being made upon it, not by the enemies of the tariff system, but by the friends of that system. And if it shall be destroyed let it be remembered that it was the Samson of this House, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, who tore down the pillar that supports the entire structure.

I have said, Mr. Chairman, that this measure would be a reversal of our policy both in regard to the tariff system and in regard to the relation that exists between our new insular possessions and the United States Government. Let me briefly refer to what has been the policy of this Government heretofore in regard to infant industries, and particularly in regard to the beet-sugar industry. As the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] said the other day, the beet-sugar industry is one that has engaged the attention of the best statesmen of the world. The Republican party, recognizing that this was a country of vast agricultural possibilities and that so essentially an agricultural product as sugar could be produced in this country, very wisely passed in a Republican Congress, in the McKinley tariff bill, signed by a Republican President, a provision which granted a bounty to the producers of sugar upon American soil. In addition to that the McKinley bill contained a provision exempting from the payment of tariff duties all machinery imported into this country for the purpose of being erected in the beet-sugar factories.

When the Democratic party came into power in the legislative branch and in the executive branch of the Government it passed what was known as the Wilson tariff bill, repealing the provision of the McKinley bill granting the bounty.

When the next Republican national convention was held, in 1896, the party adopted a platform condemning the Democratic party in unmistakable terms for what it charged to be a breach of faith to the sugar producers of the country and pledging itself to the enactment of such legislation as would enable the people of the United States to produce upon American soil and by American labor all the sugar consumed by the American people, and for which the people of the United States at that time were annually paying something over a hundred million dollars. The first measure passed by the Republican Congress elected upon that platform was the Dingley tariff bill, a bill which, in my judgment, has contributed very largely to the prosperity that this nation has enjoyed from that time to the present. In the Dingley tariff bill the present sugar schedule, still upon the statute book, was enacted for the purpose of encouraging and promoting the growth of beet sugar.

There were a good many people, both in Congress and out of it, particularly in my State, who either opposed or refused to give their support to the Dingley tariff bill, but I am glad to say that they have now become ardent supporters at least of the sugar schedule in that bill; but I regret to say that there were a great many in Congress who were earnest and honest supporters of that measure, and of the sugar schedule, who, by changes in regard to the importation of sugar from foreign countries and from our insular possessions, have been gradually but surely destroying the efficacy of that measure so far as the beet-sugar industry is concerned. The beet-sugar industry has grown from 1896 to the present time, but it has not grown anything like as rapidly as it would have grown had it not been for the free admission of sugar from Porto Rico and the reduction of duty on sugar from Cuba and from the Philippine Islands. As the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. PAYNE] said when discusing the Porto Rican bill, there were at that time 51 beet-sugar factories—not 100, as the gentleman said in his exaggerated statement the other day, but 51 beet-sugar factories—then arranged to be constructed in this country, only 5 or 6 of which have since been erected.

The reduction of duty on sugar from Cuba may not have shut up any of the beet-sugar factories in my State—I do not know how it was in Michigan—but unquestionably, in my mind, it has retarded the growth and development of that industry. I have said also, Mr. Chairman, that if this bill should be enacted into law it marks the reversal of Republican policy in regard to the relation existing between our new insular possessions and the United States Government. That question, sir, to my mind, is the most important one involved in the consideration of this measure. It rises far above any local interest in any domestic industry. It is one fraught with possibilities that affect all of the industries of the United States.

For the first time, Mr. Chairman, upon the floor of this House since the Spanish-American treaty was signed, the argument has been made in advocacy of this bill that although this Government has the legal right to impose a tariff duty for protection upon imports from its insular possessions into the United States and upon imports from the United States into its insular possessions, although it has that legal right, as determined by the Supreme Court of the United States, yet we have no moral right to impose such a duty. It is urged now for the first time, I say, Mr. Chairman, that when we have any possessions in any part of the globe, no matter what may be the conditions that may prevail in those possessions, no matter what may be for the welfare of the people of those possessions, no matter what may be for the welfare of the people of the United States, yet we must extend to all of those possessions the same tariff laws that we have in force governing our importations into our own country and governing our own market.

Mr. Chairman, I deny that we have any such limitation in governing our possessions. I would rather go back to what was the principle and policy of the Republican party when we acquired these possessions. At that time it was the declared purpose and policy of our party, declared repeatedly on the floor of this House, declared in its platform, that when we acquired possessions we had not only the legal right but the moral duty to impose such tariff upon imports from these possessions into our own country as might be best for the welfare of the people of those islands and for the welfare of the people of the United States.

I can well conceive, Mr. Chairman, that it may be possible in the course of time that the United States Government will have some possessions where it may be necessary, not only for the welfare of those possessions that the tariff duty shall be a protective tariff duty, a duty that shall be imposed upon the imports into those possessions, but it may also be necessary to protect the industries of one possession against the industries of another possession. No other nation on the face of the earth, so far as I know, as I now recollect, has ever felt that it was bound to treat all of its possessions by one fixed and unalterable rule. All the nations of the earth that have had possessions have gone on the theory that the mother government has a right to legislate as will be best for each possession, taking each case alone, and governed by the conditions and circumstances that exist in that possession. That was the rule of the Republican party. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that if it had been urged at the time we acquired the Philippine Islands or Porto Rico that we would be compelled, either legally or morally, to extend our tariff laws to them, and to make it possible that the industries of those tropical countries should come into competition with the industries of our country, that the cheap labor of those semicivilized countries should come into competition with the highly civilized labor of this country, that any political party would have been found that would have been in favor of annexation of those islands, or any respectable number of people of the United States would have indorsed such a policy. It was not the view of our leaders at that time, as I shall attempt to demonstrate to you. In quoting from the speeches of these gentlemen I do not do it, Mr. Chairman, in any critical spirit, not for the purpose of showing that they have changed their views, because I well know that all men change their views as conditions may change, but this is a fundamental principle that I am discussing, and I cite these gentlemen and the speeches made by them because I believe they are eminent authorities upon such a proposition.

The first gentleman whose speech I desire to quote from is the gentleman who now so ably presides over the Committee on Ways and Means of this House. I want to quote from the speech made by the gentleman upon the floor of this House on the 19th of February, 1900, at the time the Porto Rican bill was under discussion. The gentleman from New York at that time said, Mr. Chairman, after telling the part that he had taken in putting the bounty in the McKinley bill, and after telling the House of the pride he felt in having secured the sugar schedule in the Dingley bill, for all of which I most cheerfully pay my gratitude to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee—he then used this language:

> I want to go a step farther than that and declare to the country and to the world that when we legislate for this island, when we propose the tariff, we have the duty and the power and the privilege, under the Constitution, of imposing a tariff on all articles coming to the territory belonging to the United States from the United States, or coming to the United States from the territory belonging to the United States.

You will notice that he says not only that we have the power under the Constitution, but that we have the duty under the Constitution. It was not simply a question of power, it was a question of right or wrong, a question of duty, and the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee said we not only had the power, but that we had the duty of imposing this tariff upon the importations from those possessions. He went further than that. He also said:

I want to make a precedent that all men can read with reference to the Philippine Islands; and if Cuba shall come, I want to give notice to Cuba that we propose to protect this industry—

And he meant the beet-sugar industry—

when it comes to the question of admitting 1,000,000 tons that will come from Cuba.

You will notice that he linked the Philippine Islands and Cuba together in that statement. "I want to give notice," says the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, "that if Cuba shall come I propose to establish this precedent both for Cuba and for the Philippine Islands."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to what another member of the Ways and Means Committee said, a gentleman who served then and serves now with very great ability upon that distinguished committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL]. He delivered upon the floor of this House upon the same day a most able argument upon the constitutional power and the legal proposition involved in placing the duty upon Porto Rican sugar. It was one of the ablest speeches that was delivered at that time upon that weighty question. It was one that I am sure I have read with interest and with instruction. It is one that I would have every Member, and particularly every Republican Member, of the House read, and read often. He not only discussed the legal power that this Government had, but he, like the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, went farther and discussed what was our duty in the premises. Let me now call attention to what he had to say upon this question:

And yet, attempting now for the first time to legislate for one of our new possessions, we are met with the proposition that all of our new possessions must be governed by one fixed, unvarying system, and that the system which applies to ourselves, the freest and the most intelligent people on the face of the earth.

Is not that the argument which is now being made on this bill, that we must extend free trade to the Philippine Islands because we have granted free trade to Porto Rica and to Hawaii, and that we must have but one rule to govern all of our possessions? Was I wrong when I said that it never before was urged upon the floor of this House by any Republican—yes, by a Democrat, many of them, but never by a Republican—that we must treat all of our possessions in exactly the same way? What further did the gentleman say upon that occasion? How did he characterize this proposition? I shall let him speak for himself:

An amazing proposition, involving free trade with the Philippines, the extension to them of our navigation laws, and the incorporation into the body politic of from six to twelve millions of semisavages. How do you like the problem?

How do you like the problem? That was the question that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] then propounded to the House and which I now propound to the Republican Members on the floor of the House. That was not all that the gentleman from Pennsylvania had to say upon that occasion. Let me read a little further:

The question of free trade or protection with reference to this little island is one of absolutely no importance, but when you come to say that under the limitations of the Constitution you must give free trade to the Philippines, you must incorporate into the body politic 12,000,000 Malays as citizens of the United States, and must extend to that archipelago our navigation laws, I call a halt. In behalf of my own people I am not willing to see the wage-earner of the United States, the farmer of the United States, put upon a level and brought into competition with the cheap, half-slave labor, savage labor of the Philippine Archipelago.

[Applause and laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I indorse his language and appeal now to the Republican Members on the floor of this House to see to it that the cheap, half-slave, semisavage labor of the Philippine Islands shall not be brought into competition with the American farmer and the American laborer. The issue is here, gentlemen; you can not escape it or evade it. You must meet it, and meet it as men. From one of our own leaders you have had the prediction that this question would arise and that he would stand up against such competition. Now, as a good Republican, believing in the doctrines of your party, I ask you to follow the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] when he made that speech and see that this competition is not brought about. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, it was not alone some of our leaders who declared what the Republican policy was upon this question. After the Porto Rican question had been before the House of Representatives a Congressional election came before the people of the United States. The Republican party was anxious—and properly so, as I was also—to see that Republican Members were elected. I was unfortunately a candidate at that time, and I was not able to convince a majority of the people of my district that it was to their interest to elect a Republican, but in that campaign the party to which I was then proud to owe allegiance, and to which I am prouder now than ever before—for I do not believe my party will ever commit this wrong against the farmers and laborers of the United States—issued a campaign text-book which was intended as a guidebook, with which the speakers should go to the people of the United States, and that had something to say about this Porto Rican measure. Let me tell you what is contained in that text-book:

The first thought which came to the minds of the farmers, when the events following the war for the liberation of Cuba brought under our control certain tropical areas, was whether or not the possession or control of tropical territory by the United States would injure, or, perhaps, destroy the opportunities which they believed they had almost within their grasp for supplying the $100,000,000 worth of sugar which the people of the United States annually consume. This fear, if it reached a stage in which it could be called by that name, was answered in the negative by the Republican party when it passed the Porto Rican bill. The Democratic party fought with all its power to prevent the enactment of that measure which placed a duty upon articles coming into the United States from Porto Rico. That duty was small—

But, said this text-book—

It was an explicit declaration—

Mark this language, gentlemen—

It was an explicit declaration by the Republican party that it proposed to retain the power to fix such tariff as it might deem judicious against the products of cheap tropical labor wherever located and under whatever conditions. In other words, it was a distinct promise—

Listen to this also—

It was a distinct promise to the farmer that he need not fear that the Republican party would permit the cheap labor and the cheap sugar of any tropical territory to be brought in a manner which would destroy the infant industry of beet-sugar production, which the farmers of the United States have, under the fostering care of the Republican party, been building up during the last few years.

Will you keep your promise, gentlemen? I believe you will when you vote upon this measure. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think I have demonstrated this measure is a Democratic measure, and not a Republican measure; that it is what the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], in his report, as minority leader, said—a step, from the standpoint of Democracy, in the right direction, a step in favor of free trade, and, consequently, from the standpoint of Republicans, a step in the wrong direction. It ought to be voted down by every Republican member of this House.

I have talked with little effect so far if I have not also demonstrated that the passage of this bill involves a complete reversal of the policy of the Republican party in regard to its treatment of our insular possessions. It is not a question of legal power, it is not a question of moral duties that is involved. It is, sirs, merely a question of policy—a policy as to whether it is best for the interests of the people of these islands and best for our eighty-odd millions of people in continental America that this bill should pass. In the consideration of that question there are three matters involved. First, will the legislation, if enacted, benefit the Filipino? Second, will it injure any domestic industry? Third, will any possible benefit to the Filipino be offset by any possible injury to American industries? I want to discuss those three questions. In doing so, Mr. Chairman, I shall not refer very freely to the testimony taken before the Ways and Means Committee. I think it is a perfectly fair statement to make in regard to that testimony that you can prove anything on earth in regard to this question you want from that testimony. I do not know anything about the truth of the story that my friend from Michigan told on the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee the other day. I do not know and do not believe that he occupied the position that gentleman said he did; but I do know, and I say so after attending practically all the sessions of the Ways and Means Committee, that the sugar-beet industry did occupy the position before that committee that the gentleman said, viz, that of a defendant. I am satisfied that the gentlemen upon that committee—a majority of the majority members—in fact, all of them—honestly believe that this legislation will not injure the beet-sugar industry; but I was convinced from the first day I timidly entered the room of the Committee on Ways and Means that the majority members of that committee had then determined upon the bill that they would bring into this House, and that the testimony taken before that committee was not for the purpose of getting information upon the question, but practically for the purpose of getting argument in support of the bill that they had predetermined they would report to this House.

I listened, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, to the profound and technical arguments that were made before that committee both at the last session of Congress and at this session of Congress. I confess that at times that testimony was somewhat unintelligible to me. It was in a language with which I am not familiar. I heard a great deal about pesos, centavos, carabaos, quintals, kilos, ratoons, and piculs, and other digestible and indigestible things. It may have been that the other gentlemen understood all of the testimony, but I took consolation in my ignorance when I found the chairman of the committee or some other distinguished member of the committee asking one of the witnesses to translate his testimony into the English language. I submit that that testimony is full of contradictions and of conflicts. You can prove from that testimony that it does not cost but a little over half a cent a pound to raise sugar in the Philippine Islands. You can prove from that testimony that it costs a cent and a half a pound to raise sugar in the Philippine Islands. You can prove from that testimony that the Filipinos will never be able to produce to exceed two or three hundred thousand tons of sugar, and you can prove from that testimony that there are 50,000,000 acres of land in the Philippine Islands capable of producing from 2½ to 3 tons of sugar an acre—far beyond the total world's consumption. You can prove from that testimony that a ratoon crop, which I learned to be a subsequent crop grown from the first planting of the cane, is rarely raised in the islands. You can prove by other witnesses that were called before that committee that ratoon crops are of frequent occurrence in the Philippine Islands, and that each ratoon crop is better than the original. And so it is not my purpose to refer very much to that testimony in support of my argument.

The first question that I have taken up in considering the policy of this legislation is whether or not the legislation will benefit the Filipino. You will remember, gentlemen of the committee, that after the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee concluded his argument upon the floor of the House the other day I asked him the explicit question, "Will this legislation, in your judgment, benefit the Filipino?" What was his answer? I may not quote him exactly, because I am speaking from memory, but the effect of it and the substance of it, as I recall, was this: "I am somewhat doubtful myself as to what, if any, benefit the Filipino will derive from the legislation." And then I said, "What is the purpose of this legislation?" "Oh," said the gentleman, "the Filipinos think it will, and I am governed somewhat by sentiment in this matter."

And then I asked the gentleman if it were from a sentimental rather than from an economical standpoint that he proposed this legislation, and he burst forth in one of those vigorous announcements of his, "Why, no; it is right. Can you not comprehend it? That is why I am for it. It is right." That is an argument that is always made when you can not think of anything else to say in support of your position. Right? Was it right when the Porto Rican question was under consideration? Not then. Right does not change, whether gentlemen change their views or not. Will it benefit the Filipino? I believe what the gentleman who presides with such dignity and ability over the destiny of this House proved to my satisfaction when he discussed the Porto Rican bill was right, and that was that the reduction of duty to Porto Rico, or rather the admission of sugar from Porto Rico free of duty, would go to the benefit of the sugar trust and not to the poor Porto Rican. I think it was the distinguished gentleman who described that trust in that debate as that damnable, infernal, red-eyed, baldheaded, brimstone-eating sugar trust, and proved that the benefit of this legislation would go to that trust instead of to the Porto Ricans.

And so I submit to you, gentlemen, that if this legislation is passed you are not helping the Filipino. You are helping that trust so graphically described, and the benefit of this legislation will go into the pockets of the sugar trust and not into the pockets of the poor Filipino. Why, even the President of the United States—and I yield to no man upon the floor of this House in my admiration for his ability, for his patriotism, for his courage, and for his wisdom—but even he, in recommending this legislation to the House, seemed to be very doubtful as to what benefit, if any, the Filipino will receive from the legislation. On page 50 of his message as it came to the House you will find the following language:

> I do not anticipate that free trade between the islands and the United States will produce a revolution in the sugar and tobacco production of the Philippine Islands.
> The enactment of a law by the Congress of the United States making provision for free trade between the islands and the United States, however, will be of great importance from a political and sentimental standpoint; and while its actual benefit has doubtless been exaggerated by the people of the islands, they will accept this measure of justice as an indication that the people of the United States are anxious to aid the people of the Philippine Islands in every way, and especially in the agricultural development of their archipelago.

Undoubtedly, as I think, I hear the gentleman from the Ways and Means Committee now whisper, he got his suggestion of sentimentality from the message of the President of the United States.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman evidently did not hear "the gentleman's" suggestion.

Mr. BONYNGE. May be I misunderstood the gentleman. But at all events it is suggested that this legislation would be wise from a political and a sentimental standpoint. I think, gentlemen, before we enact it we ought to stop to consider what the effect will be upon the local industry before taking that step.

Now, let me say in conclusion, about the first proposition, relative to the benefit to the Filipinos, that the best conclusion I can arrive at upon that phase of the question is that it may do the Filipinos some good; how much, nobody knows. But certainly, according to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and even according to the President of the United States, and according to every witness who has been heard upon this proposition, certainly very much less benefit than the Filipino himself expects he will get from this legislation. We know that it will disappoint the Filipino, and necessarily trouble will arise from that disappointment. Now, what will be its effect upon the home industry? I am not a beet-sugar expert; I am not interested in any beet-sugar factory or in any farm upon which beets are grown; but I speak upon this phase of the question as a protectionist and as a Republican. I do not believe we can determine from the testimony taken in the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee what its future will be. I think we can determine that question far better by considering what has been the effect of similar legislation that has been enacted in regard to other tropical countries. We have had a treaty of reciprocity with the Hawaiian Islands for something like thirty years. I think the treaty was ratified in 1875. At that time these islands produced, as I remember the figures, a little over 11,000 tons of sugar a year. To-day they are producing nearly 400,000 tons of sugar annually. What has been the effect in Porto Rico? Prior to the passage of the Porto Rican bill the island of Porto Rico did not produce more than 66,000 tons of sugar a year. Last year it produced 116,000 tons, I believe it was; and if I remember the statement made by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, it will produce this year 210,000 tons of sugar. Now, what has happened in Cuba? Prior to the reduction of the duty upon Cuban sugar they produced, as I remember the figures, last year something like 600,000 tons of sugar. This year it is estimated, as I got the figures yesterday from the chairman, as I remember his figures, 1,100,000 and some odd tons.

Mr. FORDNEY. One million three hundred thousand.

Mr. BONYNGE. The gentleman says that Willett & Gray make it 1,100,000.

Mr. FORDNEY. One million three hundred thousand.

Mr. BONYNGE. The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means says it is 1,100,000 tons. It does not make any difference whether it is 1,100,000 or 1,300,000; I do not care which it was; the effect of the legislation was to increase enormously the production of sugar in Cuba, in Porto Rico, and in the Hawaiian Islands, and with the Philippine Islands or any other tropical country it can not be other than that. I find that I am getting close to where my time will expire.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has eleven minutes remaining.

Mr. BONYNGE. I thank the gentleman. I do not think I will consume more than twenty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Colorado be permitted to conclude his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BONYNGE. Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems incredible to me that a great committee of the House of Representatives should seriously propose a measure purporting to be for the benefit of the Filipinos and purporting to be introduced for the purpose of encouraging and promoting the development of the cane-sugar industry of those islands and then argue that it is impossible to expect any growth or any increase in the production of sugar that will amount to anything at all. I do not believe that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means or a great committee of this House would ever say so futile and absurd a thing as that. To enact legislation for the purpose of promoting and encouraging an industry in the Philippine Islands and at the same time to say that they are handing the Filipinos a "gold brick" and that there will not be any increased production or do them any practical good is a proposition I can not comprehend. It stands to reason, I think, that if we enact this legislation there will be an enormous increase in the production of sugar in those islands, just as there has been in every tropical country for which we have opened the markets of our country for their sugar.

But they tell us that even if there should be an increased production we need have no fear of it, for the sugar will go to Hongkong, and that the market for Philippine sugar is China and Japan and not the United States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to what some witnesses for the Government have said, and I believe this is the only time I have quoted from this testimony upon any proposition. There was one witness called, a very voluble gentleman from Mississippi, a free-trade Democrat, as I remember, who liked "a little protection on the side," and he made this statement in reference to where the sugar of the Philippines would go:

I think we can well afford to take this risk, because I have always believed myself that the reduction in duty which we ask for will send a large part of our sugar—

Where—to Hongkong? Not much—to the United States, where there is and always will be a market for much more than we will ever grow.

Another witness, called by the Government upon these hearings, was the governor of the Philippine Islands, Governor Wright, who came, I suppose, from the Philippine Islands purposely to testify before this committee. Here is what he said:

I have heard the argument advanced by Mr. Hathaway or Mr. Humphrey, I am not sure which, probably both of them, that in view of the Brussels treaty the signatory powers will regard the reduction of the tariff here as a bounty to the Filipino sugar growers, and therefore will impose a differential against them. I am not prepared to say—of course we must be frank about these matters—that the result of passing this bill will not be very largely to cause the sugars that grow in the Philippine Islands to come to the United States. I rather think, and certainly hope, this will be so.

That was the testimony of the governor of those islands. Why do gentlemen tell us that we need not fear competition from the Philippine Islands if they have an increased production of sugar? Why tell us that, when their own witnesses, those who ought to know about this subject if anybody does, say that if there shall be an increased production of sugar in the Philippine Islands the sugar will come, and they hope it will come, to the United States?

It occurs to me, as I now proceed, Mr. Chairman, that in discussing one other branch of this subject I omitted what seems to me to be a very essential point. While I was discussing the relation that this Government bears to Porto Rico I attempted to show you that it had never been the policy of this Government since the Spanish-American treaty to establish the principle that we must have one fixed and invariable rule for the government of all these possessions. I want now to show you that we never have treated them alike, that we never propose to, and that the bill now under consideration by this committee, if it shall be enacted into law, does not propose to treat the Philippine Islands as it treats Porto Rico and the rest of the possessions of the United States. I want to show you that it is not only a gold-brick proposition in reference to the production of sugar and the benefit that the Filipino will get from the increased production of sugar, but I want to show you also that they will not have free trade with the United States in 1909, after this bill goes into effect; that this bill is adroitly drawn for the purpose—no, I will not say that, because I do not know, but that this bill is adroitly drawn—so that the result of it will be that while the Filipino may think he is treated exactly the same as the other States and Territories and as a part of the United States in all respects in regard to tariff, it will not be so. Let me call your attention now to this language; and, gentleman of the committee, both Republicans and Democrats, I want you to listen to this language. Here is what it provides:

That on and after the 11th day of April, 1909—

Now, mark you—

all articles and merchandise going from the United States into the Philippine Islands—

Shall be admitted free of duty. Free trade upon all articles and merchandise of every kind and description going from the United States into the Philippine Islands. Is the relation to be reciprocal? Listen now to the language of the bill that we are considering:

And all articles wholly the growth and product of the Philippine Islands coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands shall be admitted free of duty.

Note the distinction. All articles and merchandise, of whatever kind and description, going from the United States into the Philippine Islands shall be admitted free of duty; but not all articles and merchandise coming from the Philippine Islands into the United States. No; not much.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BONYNGE. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is the Dingley tariff in force in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. BONYNGE. Certainly not. Therefore you are not treating the Philippine Islands as you are treating the rest of the United States. That is my contention and that is the reason why——

Mr. MANN. The Philippine tariff is less than the Dingley tariff, is it not?

Mr. BONYNGE. I do not know; I think it is. I think it is an ad valorem tariff.

Mr. MANN. So that this is to protect articles from an oriental country coming to this country by way of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. BONYNGE. Undoubtedly; showing that you are not treating the Philippine Islands as you treat the rest of the United States, because you have given the Philippine Islands an entirely different tariff bill that governs importations into the United States from foreign countries. When you ship goods into the Philippine Islands from any country upon the face of the earth except from the United States you pay a different rate of duty than when you ship those goods into the United States or into any other possession of the United States, and that difference in treatment of the Philippine Islands has made necessary this distinction in this bill. That is just as useful for the purposes of my argument, and even more so, and I thank the gentleman from Illinois for calling my attention to the fact that there is a separate and distinct tariff bill for those islands. The purpose of my argument was to show, and I think I have shown conclusively, that the same sort of relations do not exist in the tariff laws with those islands, and will not exist after 1909, as with the other possessions of the United States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think I have also demonstrated that there is but little if any benefit which will go to the Filipino from this legislation, and from what we have seen occur in other tropical countries there is certainly, to put it mildly, at least very grave danger that not only may the sugar-beet industry be menaced, but be seriously crippled in its growth and development in this country. I hope I am wrong. I hope the gentlemen of the Ways and Means Committee who have proposed and advocated this bill are right, and that no injury will come to this industry; but I do say, and I say it as forcibly and earnestly as I am capable of, that it is not the duty or the right of this Government, when no benefit is going to the Filipino or a part of the benefit is going to the sugar trust, that this legislation should be enacted even if it is only a menace and a threat to the beet-sugar industry of this country. I fear it will be more.

The American farmer, Mr. Chairman, is entitled to as much consideration from the American Congress as the little brown man across the Pacific. The people in my district are patriotic people. If they believed that it was necessary for the honor of their country that the beet-sugar industry of which they are so proud should be menaced or even destroyed they would sacrifice it gladly upon the altar of patriotism. They do not believe that it is either necessary or wise that they should be subjected to such a risk or asked to make the sacrifice.

We listened the other day to a most eloquent and entertaining description of the trip taken last summer by certain Members of this House to the Philippine Islands. I would take you gentlemen with me to-day upon another trip. I would take you to fair Colorado, where the sun shines the brightest, the sky is the clearest, and the air is the purest, where all life is one continual joy from the rise of the early morning sun until it sinks below the snow-capped peaks of our eternal mountain range, the very treasure house of the nation's wealth. I would take you to the farms that have been tilled by American farmers who left their homes in the East, traveled across what you knew in your boyhood days as the great American desert, and who have by their indomitable will and their indomitable courage converted that desert into rich and fertile farms, the home of American citizens, rearing American families and American children for the discharge of American citizenship. I would take you to the beet fields of Colorado and show you the wonderful change and improvement that this new industry has brought about.

I would take you to the proud city of Denver, that no American has ever visited without feeling the blood flow a little faster in his veins, when he realizes that his sons and his daughters have built that magnificent city in the very center of what was once the despised American desert. I would have you see its costly public edifices; I would have you see its stately structures of mart and commerce; I would have you see its churches, its universities, its schools, its palatial homes of the rich, its comfortable homes of the men of moderate means, and even its cozy homes of the few poor we have in our city. I would have you see these and many other things that are far beyond my power of description. And then, gentlemen, I would have you legislate so as to make it possible under the reclamation act that there shall be not only the farms that now exist on that desert, but that all of that great region shall be converted into the homes of happy and contented people. I would have you so legislate that not only the city of Denver but many cities like Denver might grow up in the Rocky Mountain region.

Oh, my Republican friends, I appeal to you as Republicans, believing in the fundamental principles of your party, to defeat this un-Republican measure. I appeal to you, my Democratic friends on the floor of this House, I appeal to the entire membership of the House, to defeat this un-American measure. [Prolonged applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2558. An act authorizing the Washington Bridge Company to construct a bridge across the Columbia River near the city of Wenatchee, Wash.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, during my service in this House no bill has been presented to this House that in my judgment presents so many difficulties to the candid, honest legislator as does this bill now under consideration. While I have reached my own conclusion as to how I shall vote on this bill, I am frank to confess that in my judgment either a Democrat or a Republican can vote either for or against the bill and logically defend his action. This fact grows out of the character, the essential nature of legislation itself, and the peculiar position of the two countries which are to be affected by the legislation.

I learned long ago as a law student that law is "a rule of action;" that it presupposes permanency, that it seeks to establish and extend precedent, that it contemplates fixed relations, and seeks to establish rules of conduct for the permanent control of those to whom the legislation applies.

How can either a Democrat or a Republican vote on this question from that basis? Are there any fixed relations known and read of all men subsisting between the United States and the Philippine Islands? Are lawyers or statesmen, either or both, agreed as to what the condition is or as to what it will be a year, two years, three years, ten years, a generation, or a hundred years from now?

It strikes me as irresistible in logic that a man who is honestly and intelligently on the tariff question either a Republican or a Democrat must find a difficulty in determining how he should vote on this bill. If a Democrat, he believes in the doctrine of "tariff for revenue only;" he believes that the tariff is a tax levied upon the consuming masses of the country to furnish a revenue sufficient to meet the needs of an honest government economically administered. He knows no protection to any section, class, or industry in any part of the country to which the Constitution applies. If a Republican, he believes in that economic theory which says it is better and wiser to use the taxing powers of the Federal Government to build up the manufacturing classes and increase the wage of the employees of those. Both these definite and settled views on the tariff question came into being, were taught and fixed by great men, when no man dreamed that we would plunge out into colonial conquest and have dependencies or colonies, or whatever you desire to call them, that would be a now-you-see-them and now-you-don't-see-them when you come to legislate on the tariff.

No man here is bound to support this bill by any Democratic platform, or by any caucus expression. I am in favor of treating them now as I hope them ultimately to be, and that is as foreign territory. I hope to see them ultimately become that when we can cut loose from all the pestiferous gang over there that afflicts us, and I am willing to treat them now no better and no worse than we treat other and more civilized and enlightened nations. I see no reason in logic why we should discriminate in their favor with tariff and against France, England, or Germany, or any other country with whom we have trade relations. I see no Democracy in that, no business sense in that, and yet I am so much a Democrat, so much a lover of the Constitution of my country that if you will say by Congressional enactment, if you will fix by the will of the people that the status of the Philippine Islands is to be a part of American territory, then I will vote cheerfully to support the Constitution and hence for free trade absolutely between the islands and the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But so long as you fix no status, so long as a man is free to choose for himself, whether they shall be American territory or foreign territory, whether we shall take them in and make them ultimately States and clothe them with all the powers and duties and responsibilities of American citizenship, whether we shall hold them perpetually in vassalage as a colony, or whether we shall ultimately turn them loose to some foreign government or by the establishment of an independent government there—so long as these three views are open I feel free to take the one which I think most logically tends to the result I hope to produce and which I know to be decidedly most in the interest of the people which I represent.

Mr. Chairman, I am weary, I am tired of all this talk and all this voting to reduce Philippine and Cuban tariffs while the trusts, organized under the Dingley bill, milk the American consumer to the limit and sell their surplus abroad cheaper than they sell to the American consumer. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I am for an honest revision of the tariff; for the revision of the tariff which does not extend to the trusts an increased foreign market at the expense of the agriculturists of the land and allow them to milk the home market to the limit by organization under high protection under the Dingley bill. I tell you the country is tired of this standing pat on the domestic tariff and whittling away the interests of the agricultural masses with treaties and Philippine bills, reducing the tariff which touches the products of the American farmer. I do not think this bill will ruin either the sugar, the tobacco, or the rice industry in the United States. I do not think that and I do not say that, but the tendency is to hurt them. About that there can be no question. Take the sugar schedule. The differential remains. It bars off European competition with refined sugar in the American market. Men who do not know that ought to go home and find out something from their wives. They know it. Everybody that frequents the grocery store knows that. We tried that with Cuban reciprocity and we got a dose, and the Government has been losing from ten to twelve millions in revenue, the American consumer has got no manufactured product any cheaper, and the Cuban is still crying for bread.

This bill is like that. Reduce the sugar schedule between the Philippines and the United States and what will be the result? Why, if we leave the differential, which bars off competition with refined sugar in the American market, the sugar trust will only bring the raw material from the Philippines cheaper into the American markets and pocket the difference, and the consumer will pay the same old price, and you can console yourself with talking about taking a step in the right direction; but I have no use for steps that never go anywhere. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Take the rice situation—a great growing industry in Texas, in Louisiana, and in other parts of the country, contributing rapidly more and more to the untold wealth of American products. This rice schedule will operate this way. Why, they say they must import rice into the Philippine Islands. Why, surely they do, and under the Philippine tariff they can import rice there and eat imported rice and send the Philippine rice over here and make 98 cents a hundred on the deal. That is what this bill permits on rice.

It will not do to say it will not hurt the rice raiser in the United States because they import rice into the Philippines, because the Filipino is not a fool when it comes to a trade, and if he can sell the rice he raises at bigger price and import under a lower tariff rice to meet his necessities in place of it, of course he will do it. More than that, likely some shrewd speculators who see a great opportunity to organize a corner in the Philippine rice crop will buy at a slight advance and import in lieu of it Japanese rice into that market and sell to them at a slight advance, then export the Philippine rice into the market of the United States and pocket the profits which this legislation will permit. I do not believe that is Democratic. You take the tobacco schedule. I frankly admit that I do not know if that cuts very much ice; but I do know that the rice and sugar propositions are serious ones. Oh, my friend CHAMP CLARK, with that distinguished air which characterizes this brilliant man from Missouri, in reply to BOB BROUSSARD'S question, said, "Why, the sugar they raised in the Philippine Islands did not amount to a drop in the bucket," yet you will find in his speech this morning that he says that the Filipino people the year before the war raised within a few hundred tons of as much cane sugar as all the United States raised. That is a fact.

You remember after the Cuban war the Cubans did not raise so much sugar, because agriculture and everything was broken up by the war, and so in the Philippines; but they will raise it faster when you give them a start, and it will pour into the coffers of the trust the difference between existing tariff now and this cut. Will they manufacture it into refined sugar and sell cheaper, to the benefit of the American consumer? Not on your life. They will use the benefits of that trade to crush out the beet-sugar industry in this country, and the cane sugar also to the extent they think it is a business proposition to do it.

Now, the difficulty which presents itself to my mind and which must present itself to the mind of every thinking man here is, Can I fix any fundamental view upon which I can determine how I ought to vote upon this bill? And this only illustrates the continued difficulty which arises in this House upon every subject of legislation which touches the Philippine Islands. They bring in a bill here that fixes a coinage, banking, and currency system for the Filipinos.

Take a Democrat who believes in a bimetallic coinage of intrinsic value money and a paper money redeemable in such coin or a Republican who believes in metallic money, gold money alone, and a paper money redeemable in such coin, both believe that every dollar ought to be equal to every other dollar everywhere the Constitution applies, and that the system should be fixed, and yet we are up against the same trouble. Are the Philippines to be a part of us or not; are they to be colonies with independent legislation or not; are we to turn them loose finally or not, and until that is decided how can you legislate in a successful business way? [Applause on the Democratic side.] Take another illustration——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman from Texas permit an interruption now?

Mr. BURGESS. Surely.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I take it that the gentleman will agree with me that whatever the Philippines ought to be, they are on equality with the American Government at present?

Mr. BURGESS. That is about the size of it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before the American revolution we were colonists of Great Britain. Would the gentleman have deemed it right, just, and fair at that time, with the legislation which Great Britain had upon its statute books, putting up tariffs against all sorts of products from America, so that Great Britain, the home country, could manufacture and sell to us everything? Was it not one of the grievances of which we complained that they did not give English money in America the same trade rights that they gave English money in Great Britain? Does the gentleman think, in other words, that under a colonial system even, and we have it now, that it is fair to exploit your colony by commercial discrimination?

Mr. BURGESS. I do not seek to exploit them, but I do not propose to help them exploit us. I am not willing to legislate from the basis that we will treat these people as colonists. I do not believe in colonial government, and I am not willing to begin to legislate from that basis of assumed relationship between them and us. [Applause.] I did not create the existing conditions and I will not recognize it by tariff or otherwise. [Applause.]

More than that, the gentleman's report has shown that he did not do it, because he said they are a part of the American territory, and there ought to be free trade between them and us. That is what the gentleman's report says. And yet he says a step in the right direction is to tax them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What my report says or what the report of the minority of the committee says——

Mr. BURGESS. The gentlemen are mutually responsible for it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is that the present condition of things, where they are neither domestic or foreign, and both domestic and foreign, is somewhat intolerable, but that while they are under the flag of the United States they ought to receive all the benefit as well as the burden of our control.

Mr. BURGESS. Yes, sir; then the contention of the gentleman, which I conceive to be Democratic, and with which I agree, is that, in fact, notwithstanding the decision of the Supreme Court, in fact, notwithstanding what any man or men may say, the Constitution follows the flag; that the territory is American territory; that the Constitution applies, and that no tariff can be rightfully and constitutionally levied between that country and ours. Does the gentleman agree with that? Yet the gentleman recommends that Democrats vote for the tariff, because it is slightly lower, he says, to vote to tax them as a step in the right direction.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit——

Mr. BURGESS. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The substitute bill recommends we do the very thing the gentleman says ought to be done.

Mr. BURGESS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS. To wit, give these people absolute free trade with the balance of the United States while they are a part of the United States.

Mr. BURGESS. That carries with it——

Mr. WILLIAMS. And we do not recommend the enactment of a tariff between us and them. We do recommend, if we can not get absolute free trade, that the present tariff that the Republican party has enacted between us and them be cut down as far as they are willing to cut it. So far as enacting a tariff is concerned, we are reducing tariff rates even if we vote for the Republican bill after our own bill—expressing our opinion of what really ought to be done—has failed. Would the gentleman say that if I was in the hands of a robber who demanded a hundred dollars as a ransom, that I would be recognizing his robbery by paying the hundred dollars in order to make my escape from captivity?

Mr. BURGESS. I think not. I would not so deem it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, what we are doing, then, in this is that we are in the hands of these tariff robbers as between us and the Philippine Islands. We tried to get free trade, and if we can not get free trade we pay our ransom in the shape of reduced tariff, if we can get them to agree to it.

Mr. BURGESS. We are agreed about that—that the decision is wrong, that the Philippines are a part of American territory, that the Constitution followed the flag there, the decision to the contrary notwithstanding, and that under the Constitution no constitutional tariff can be levied between those islands and us; and you justify voting for this bill by a piece of sophistry and false logic by saying you would rather be robbed out of a less sum than a larger. That is your answer.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Do I understand the gentleman to contend that when I agree to cut down a tariff between us and the Philippine Islands that I thereby stand in the attitude of favoring a tariff with the people of those islands?

Mr. BURGESS. Undoubtedly. If you vote for a thing, my friend, surely you are for it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I understand the gentleman to say that, having paid these robbers in the case that I supposed $50 to let me away, that I would be justifying the principle of robbery?

Mr. BURGESS. No, sir; I do not think much of your robbery illustration. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. And the logical effect is to admit that petty larceny is as criminal as grand larceny.

Mr. BURGESS. Sure.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And yet all the laws of civilized nations do make a distinction in the punishment dealt out to them; and so I recognize, and I am only a man of plain common sense. I thank God that Tom Carlyle said that mankind are not always logical. Sometimes they use common sense. I recognize that it is nearer right to have free trade in everything except tobacco and sugar between us and the Philippines and only a duty of 25 per cent of the existing duties upon those articles than it is to have a tariff upon everything with the present rates now existing. Now, as a matter of common sense, does not the gentleman recognize that the nearer you can approach the Democratic position—and he admits with me that the Democratic position as between us and the Philippine Islands as long as they are a part of the United States is one of free trade—does not he admit that the nearer we can approach that the more nearly Democratic we are?

Mr. BURGESS. As applied to the Philippines, I do not agree, for this reason. Let me state the logical difference from the standpoint of the Constitution between the gentleman from Mississippi and myself. He frankly confesses that because he can not defeat the grand larceny that he will vote for petty larceny, and I shall vote for neither. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the gentleman will permit me, because the man who has me on the grand larceny and may hold me there, if I can settle with him for $20 instead of $100, and I can not help it, then as a matter of common sense I would settle with him for the least amount.

Mr. BURGESS. The gentleman can not tell whether he can accomplish that. There may be enough votes of Republicans to join with the Democrats voting against this reduction to defeat it and defeat the whole bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Defeat it, yes; but that would result in bringing about another result, that of leaving upon the statute books the present tariff laws between us and the Philippine Islands.

Mr. BURGESS. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not want to defeat it to that extent.

Mr. BURGESS. Yet we would have this result: We could at least say as Democrats we did vote for what we believed the Constitution teaches, and that you can not say if you vote for any rate of tariff between the Philippine Islands and the United States. You will have to abandon your Democratic contention that the Constitution follows the flag if you vote for a tariff, be it 10 per cent, 20 per cent, or 30 per cent, for if there is any tariff at all it will be against the Constitution of the United States, and you will vote for it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman surely must see that I am not voting for the enactment of a tariff, but for reducing a tariff, and as a matter of common sense the gentleman must see the difference between the two propositions. Now, another matter, and then I will not interrupt the gentleman any more. I am glad to interrupt him when I can, because we are such goods friends personally that we can argue and interargue matters without any trouble.

Mr. BURGESS. Indeed we are.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No matter what the gentleman may think about the Constitution following the flag; no matter what was contended by the Senator from Texas, then the leader on this floor, the Hon. JOSEPH W. BAILEY, in one of the most eloquent speeches I ever heard in my life upon that point; no matter what you or I would have decided if judges upon the Supreme Court, the Supreme Court has practically decided that the Constitution, so far as the Philippines are concerned, is about as was expressed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND], "As an overcoat in the possession of Congress, and Congress can put it on and take it off whenever Congress in whim or fancy may see fit to do so, Congress being the judge as to whether the Filipino is cold enough to need the overcoat for a little while or warm enough to dispense with it for a little while." Now, I want to put this question to the gentleman: The Supreme Court of the United States has decided in those cases that Congress had a right to enact a tariff law. It upheld this very tariff law. Now, I can not reverse the Supreme Court of the United States. It was fixed by our forefathers as the governmental voice for this country upon the subject of constitutionalities and unconstitutionalities. It may be true, and it is true that I do not agree with it. It is true that you do not agree with it, but that is the constitutional law of the land.

We are standing here as practical legislators, with a high-tariff law between us and the Philippines, and we have an opportunity to make that tariff lower, and the Supreme Court says that the present tariff is constitutional. Now, how can the gentleman say we violate the Constitution in voting to lower that tariff?

Mr. BURGESS. I want to ask the gentleman a question, because I do not want any misunderstanding about our position. Does the gentleman think the decision of the Supreme Court on this question binds the legislative conscience under its oath of office?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why, I do not contend that the decision binds the legislative conscience under its oath of office, but I do contend that every practical legislator in making laws will be guided by what the court has decided to be constitutional, and he must be guided by it if he is practical, if he is not a mere doctrinaire.

For me to say that I do not believe the Supreme Court ever had a right to decide the Federal law to be constitutional which taxed State banks out of existence with a 10 per cent tax, for me to say that that decision was wrong, is one thing; but for me to go on forever butting my head up against the wall, when I can not change the decision, is another thing. I do not believe the decision was right. I do not believe the Federal Government had a right to tax State bank notes out of existence under the taxing power. Neither does the gentleman. I would not imitate that decision; in other words——

Mr. BURGESS. I would not vote for it, either, no matter if they did.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But when I come to offer an amendment to the present national-banking laws, I do not think I would take the position that because the present national-banking laws were founded upon what I thought to be a constitutional error, or what I would have decided to have been an unconstitutionality if it had been within my province to render the decision, that therefore I would not perfect or better or make less onerous the national-banking law.

Now, the Supreme Court has decided the present Philippine tariff law to be constitutional. Because I do not agree with that, am I to be forbidden to vote for a bill which proposes to make it less onerous to consumers, both in the archipelago and in America? It strikes me that that is doctrinaireism.

Mr. BURGESS. Now, let me restate the difference between the gentleman from Mississippi and myself. We are agreed that in spite of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States the Philippine territory is a part of the United States. That is a matter of fact to which our oath of office commits us, to obey the Constitution, that no tariff, at any rate, can be levied between this country and the Philippines. Now, conceding that, you report here a substitute bill in accord with that Democratic contention, namely, that we strike off all tariffs and have free trade between the Philippine Islands and all other territory of the United States, and say I am with you on that if we are to vote on a theory. Then you say that if that fails we ought to vote for the Republican bill which levies a certain other rate of tariff than the subsisting one, and I say I can not do that, because the Constitution says I can not vote for any tariff between the United States and the Philippine Islands.

Now, let the gentleman go and study that proposition, and get up against it right hot, and see whether he can answer it or not. If we start to vote on a theory not sustained by the courts or Congress, it seems we should adhere to the theory and not vote for any tariff at any rate. If we abandon this theory and vote practically recognizing existing conditions, then we can treat it as foreign territory and vote to let the existing tariff remain.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BURGESS. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman from Texas has stated that there are a certain number of Republican recalcitrants who are willing to vote against this bill—enough to beat it if we will vote against it. I want to ask him if these Republican recalcitrants are as anxious to get rid of the competition of Philippine sugar as they say they are, what is the reason they will not come in and vote with the gentleman and myself to turn those islands loose and cut loose from them forever and so remove that competition. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Is that the only alternative we have?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; it is.

Mr. BURGESS. I am very glad of the interruption of the gentleman from Missouri, because I think this purely academic discussion between the gentleman from Mississippi and myself had gone far enough so that every sensible Member can see his position and mine and determine for himself who is right. I stand on my position and he stands on his, and that is all there is to it. But I started out in this discussion with a view, not of making an extended argument about this pending bill, but of using it and collateral measures to lead up to the discussion of a resolution which I have introduced, which proposes to settle all these vexed questions about which we differ, and I think in a businesslike, reasonable, correct way, in accord with all American traditions, and in a nonpartisan way besides.

I want to send that resolution up to the Clerk's desk and ask the Clerk to read it; but before he reads it I wish to resume my argument at the point I was when the gentleman from Mississippi interrupted me. Another character of legislation which comes up here every year and which afflicts me is that the Naval Committee brings in a bill recommending an increase of the Navy to two, three, four, five, and six it may be, more battle ships. It entails an expense upon the American people of $25,000,000 or $30,000,000 to start with, and many millions more to maintain it. Now, I am up against that proposition. How shall I vote? At once my eye runs over the country and across the Pacific, and takes a panoramic view of the country of which the gentleman from Connecticut had a map hung up here which reminded me of a target that I used to shoot at when I was a boy. If we are to hold the Philippine Islands permanently, either as a colony or a part of this country, we may as well face the proposition and vote for ten new battle ships, because God knows that we shall need them in the turmoil of European politics in the Orient by the possession and dominion of the Philippine Islands.

It is true I am a Democrat, but I am much more an American than I am anything in politics. [Applause.] But I am willing, so far as I am concerned, to fling it out to the world, from Congress or elsewhere, that so long as the flag of my country flies over a single human being in the Western or Eastern Hemisphere, black or brown, every drop of American blood, every dollar of American money, shall, if necessary, stand behind American guns to protect that individual in his rights, his liberty, and his property. [Applause.]

Again, the same awful condition confronts us, if we turn the Philippines loose, or if we neutralize them by treating with European powers. There is no necessity, of course, for an increase of the Navy; there is no necessity for an increase of the Army; there is no necessity for confusing and complexing our bank currency and coinage laws; there is no necessity for gumming up our tariff situation against the interests of the American farmer.

Let me ask this House one pointed question: If the Philippine Islands were people engaged in mining coal and iron manufacturing and sending out their products into the markets of the world, show me the hair of the man in this House who believes any such Philippine legislation as this would ever come before this House! [Applause.] You stand here and ask me to vote for a mess of pottage while the steel and iron schedules of the Dingley bill afford a cover for numberless combinations that are milking the South and West and the whole country and amassing great profits and laughing up their sleeves at what Barnum called the American capacity to be gulled.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. BURGESS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman this question. I agree with his position in reference to the Philippine Islands as being a part of the territory of the United States. I do not believe that under the Constitution we have a right to provide a protective tariff against her productions brought into this country; but, coming to the practical part, I would like to ask the gentleman if the proposition was made in this House to reduce the Dingley rates 5 per cent or 10 per cent or 20 per cent, whether he would vote for or against that proposition?

Mr. BURGESS. I am glad the gentleman from Kentucky asked the question, and I will answer it in the frank spirit it was asked. If a bill were introduced to reduce the Dingley rates, especially on the steel and iron schedule 25 per cent, I would vote for it. If that failed and 20 per cent were offered, I would vote for that. If that failed and 15 per cent were offered, I would vote for that. If that failed and 10 per cent were offered, I would vote for that. If that failed and 5 per cent was offered, I would vote for it. If that failed and one quarter of one per cent were offered, I would vote for that. But just think a moment. The tariff operates under a common constitution, and I do not violate the Constitution or my oath of office voting for a tariff; I only get in a controversy with my Republican friends as to whether it is for protection or for revenue; and the Democratic party never in its history declared for free trade.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. One other question. I want to know if the gentleman really believes that under our Constitution any tariff law that has the least iota of protection in it is constitutional? How is it constitutional where there is protection in it when it exceeds the revenue point?

Mr. BURGESS. I will answer that fairly. I am not a great statesman, but I think I am sound on the tariff. I think I can make it ring like a bell any time. Yes, there always was recognized to be the vice of protection inherent in the tariff system from which we can no more get away than we can the air we breathe and everybody knows it. [Applause.] The Democratic position has been, and the Democrat has said to the Republican, "We object to your taking the incidental evil of the system of taxation and making it the basis of its levy and operation." [Applause.] A Democrat never has contended that there would not be protection to some extent to the class manufacturing the article taxed, because the Democrat has ever said the tariff is a tax to the extent of its levy, which bars competition and gives to the extent of its levy a monopoly to the home manufacturer of the article taxed. You can not get away from it. I stand for this. I say, give us on the tariff a square deal; quit cutting down the schedules of the agriculturist and his products and turn your attention to iron and steel a while. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. One other question. I think I understand the gentleman's position. I do not agree with him fully upon that.

Mr. BURGESS. Oh, come along and we will get together directly.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I do not believe the Government has a right to exercise the taxing power of the Government to build up any industry.

Mr. BURGESS. I fully agree with the gentleman in that assertion.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I do not believe we have a right to pass a law that has a particle of protection in it.

Mr. BURGESS. But you can not avoid that.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. For the purpose of protection. It may have an incidental protection in it, but for the sole purpose of protection we have no right to pass it.

Mr. BURGESS. I agree with the gentleman entirely.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Now, then, let us take the national-banking system, upon which, I suppose, the gentleman and myself agree. I want to know if the gentleman would support a proposition to compel national banks to pay interest upon their deposits?

Mr. BURGESS. Well, what on earth has that got to do with what we are talking about? [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Just this. Is the gentleman against the national banks?

Mr. BURGESS. Sure.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. And I understand the gentleman to be against the protective tariff?

Mr. BURGESS. Sure.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. The gentleman is taking the position now that because he can not get his views entirely he will vote for them partially.

Mr. BURGESS. No, no; the gentleman forgets. I have stated clearly, and I will restate it to the gentleman so that there can be no question about it, no difference between the gentleman from Kentucky and myself, that when you speak of cutting down the Dingley rates, you speak of a constitutional tariff sustained by the courts and by Democrats—some of them voted for it, by the way, unfortunately, but they were wrong——

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. We will agree on that.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The Lord has forgiven them.

Mr. BURGESS. The difference between the Democrat and the Republican on that proposition is not that the Constitution does not authorize the levy of a tariff. Everybody believes that, but the Republican says it should be levied looking to protection and the Democrat says, "No, it should be levied to raise revenue to run an honest government economically administered; get out, you whole horde of selfish fellows who want to work the Government!" But this constitutional Philippine question is another question. The Constitution by one section which controls the matter provides that taxation shall be uniform; this tariff has to be the same everywhere, and by the Democratic position the Philippines are a part of the American territory just as Texas is a part of the United States, just as New Mexico and Arizona and the Territories are a part of the United States, and that Constitution from a Democratic standpoint prohibits the levy of one-millionth of 1 per cent tariff between the Philippines and the United States.

My contention is, and the gentleman can settle with his conscience and his Democracy; my contention is, I can not vote for any tariff offered by anybody between the United States and the Philippine Islands if I vote upon the assumption they are a part of this country.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, one other question. Then the gentleman can not discriminate between the two propositions—voting to impose a tariff in the first place and voting to reduce an existing tariff in the next place.

Mr. BURGESS. Why, the gentleman must know that is a schoolboy argument that does do credit to his ability. To vote for a lesser tariff is to vote for that tariff——

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. To vote for a lesser tariff is to vote to impose a tariff?

Mr. BURGESS. No matter whether reduced or increased, if you vote for it, can you say you did not vote for that rate? Can you? Suppose the proposition is to increase, and you voted against it? You would say, "Under the Constitution, I can not vote for any tariff between the Philippine Islands and this country." Suppose they offered to reduce it and you vote for it, would you say you can vote for a tariff between the Philippines and this country? Gentlemen, you must either get back from your follow-the-flag position or vote against any tariff between the Philippine Islands and the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, the Supreme Court has knocked out the follow-the-flag business.

Mr. BURGESS. Does the gentleman take his Democracy from the Supreme Court?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not; but I take my law from the Supreme Court of the United States, and so does everybody else. I take my law from them.
